The paragraph which it was intended to amend appropriates the sum of $300,000 for the fourth of five installments to the Indians of the Colville Reservation for the cession of land opened to settlement by the act of July 1, 1892 (27 Stat. L., 62), being a part of the full sum of $1,500,000 set aside in the Treasury in payment for said land under the terms of the act of June 21, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 325, 377).

It is assumed that the insertion was intended to be made after the words "provision of law," as the words "provided by law" do not appear in the section to which reference is made.

The services for which Mr. Gordon seeks compensation were rendered by him in connection with the claim of the Colville Indians against the United States for $1,500,000 in payment for the lands on the north half of the Colville Reservation, which were opened to public settlement by the act of July 1, 1892, supra, as fully set out in his memorial presented in the Senate by Senator Clay on March 1, 1910, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The act of June 21, 1906, supra, in addition to setting aside the $1,500,000 for the use and benefit of the Colville Indians, contained the further provision that "jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment in the name of Butler & Vale (Marion Butler and Josiah M. Vale), attorneys and counselors at law, of the city of Washington, D. C., for the amount of compensation which shall be paid to the attorneys who have performed services as counsel on behalf of said Indians in the prosecution of the claim of said Indians for payment for said land, and in determining the amount of compensation for such services the court may consider all contracts or agreements heretofore entered into by said Indians with attorneys who have represented them in the prosecution of said claim, and also all services rendered by said attorneys for said Indians in the matter of said claim * * *; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay the sum of money so awarded by said court to the said attorneys (Butler & Vale) upon the rendition of final judgment, out of the said sum herein set apart or appropriated for the benefit of said Indians, and payment of said judgment shall be in full compensation to all attorneys who have rendered services to said Indians in the matter of their said claim, the same to be apportioned among said attorneys by said Butler & Vale as agreed among themselves: Provided, That before any money is paid to any attorney having an agreement with Butler & Vale as to the distribution of said fees, each of the same shall execute and deliver to the Secretary of the Interior a satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands for services rendered said Indians in the matter of their said claim."

In accordance with this provision of law a petition was filed in the Court of Claims, the case being docketed as No. 29526, Butler & Vale (Marion Butler and Josiah M. Vale) v. The United States and the Indians residing on the Colville Reservation. A decision was rendered by the court on May 25, 1908 (43 C. C., 497), and a decree entered in favor of claimants in the aggregate sum of $60,000, apportioned as follows:

Benjamin Miller, administrator of the estate of Levi Maish, deceased, $6,000.
Hugh H. Gordon, $14,000.
Marion Butler, $20,000.
Josiah M. Vale, $10,000.
Daniel B. Henderson, $5,000.
Herbert J. May, $3,000.
Frederick C. Robertson, $2,000.

The Court of Claims construed the act of June 21, 1906, supra, as limiting the court to a judgment on the basis of a quantum meruit. Booth, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"In view of the facts and circumstances surrounding the enactment of the jurisdiction statute here questioned, we can not hold otherwise than that Congress intended to reward claimants, if entitled to reward, upon the basis of a quantum meruit."

It is rather a remarkable circumstance that the jurisdictional act authorized the court to render judgment in the name of Butler & Vale, and provided that the latter should distribute the compensation awarded, when the facts as established by the court conclusively show that Butler & Vale first became interested in the case as employees of Gordon.

The findings of the court established that Maish and Gordon's contract (to which Hugh H. Gordon succeeded on the death of Maish) was the only contract ever executed by the Colville Indians respecting their claim, and that it was likewise the only legal authority whereby any attorney appeared for the Indians during its operation. It is also of interest to note that all the persons who were awarded compensation by the Court of Claims were brought into the case by Gordon in the nature of his employees; that is, Gordon did not assign to these persons an interest in his contract, as approved by the department in accordance with section 2106, Revised Statutes, but he made separate agreement with them, so that while the contract was in operation Gordon was the only attorney, after the death of Maish, recognized by the department as representing the Colville Indians in this matter, the others simply being his employees.

While it is true that the judgment of the court was not based on the contract of Gordon, and that this was simply used as evidence in the case, yet it is a remarkable fact that all the attorneys who were awarded compensation for their services were brought into the case at the instance of Hugh H. Gordon, or claimed to be so brought in, and that none of the attorneys who worked independently of Gordon was awarded compensation. Another matter worthy of notice is that Messrs. Butler & Vale were awarded by the Court of Claims a sum equal to that which they would have received from Mr. Gordon had the Indians' claim been settled while the Maish and Gordon contract was in operation and had its terms been carried out.

There seems to be no doubt that it was due to the agitation initiated by Hugh H. Gordon that the Colville Indians finally received compensation for their lands. The Indians expected at the time they made the contract with Maish and Gordon to pay 15 per cent of the amount recovered, which would have been $225,000. The department reduced the rate of compensation to 10 per cent. It seems altogether probable that if the appropriation had been made before the expiration of the Maish and Gordon contract a fee would have been allowed in the amount provided for therein. Mr. Gordon asserts that although the appropriation was not made until June 21, 1906, almost two years after the expiration of his contract, yet, as a matter of fact, the case in favor of his clients—the Indians—had been fully made up before July 25, 1904, at which time the contract, by its own terms, expired. This seems to be substantially correct in that no additional facts were presented or new argument advanced thereafter; the efforts subsequently being in the line of urging upon the Congress the justice of the claim and the propriety of an appropriation upon the facts and arguments theretofore submitted. The Congress saw fit, however, to refer the matter to the Court of Claims in the manner provided in the act of June 21, 1906. That court, in pursuance of the jurisdiction conferred upon it, has heard the case and rendered its judgment. The contention of Gordon, as set forth in his memorial presented by Senator Clay and referred to your committee March 1, 1910, that he should have been awarded a fee in the amount named in his contract rather than an amount to be determined upon the basis of a quantum meruit, is not one for this department to pass upon. If the court wrongly construed the jurisdiction act, as asserted by Gordon, and thereby did him an injustice, it is for the Congress to determine whether it may now correct the mistake. The dispute between those found by the court entitled to share in the judgment as to their respective shares is one in which this department can have no interest. The history of the case, the connection of each attorney therewith, and the services performed by each are set forth quite in detail in the statement of facts made in connection with the decision of the Court of Claims.

Very respectfully, R. A. BALLINGER, Secretary.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the date of that communication? That same fellow was here when we turned the claim down in the last Congress, in 1910.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The date of the document is May 2, 1910.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to say a word in response to what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has said. The Senator from North Carolina, in his effort to disparage this case before the Senate, says that that letter was here when the Senate turned that case down two years ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not that correct?

Mr. BACON. No, sir; it is not correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, I stand corrected.

Mr. BACON. I am proposing to correct the Senator. The Senate did not turn it down at all. It went off on a point of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was turned down; it went out; and that case was here at that time. It went out, whether the Senate turned it down or not. I do not know whether or not there was an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but that is sufficient.

Mr. BACON. But the impression sought to be produced by the Senator from North Carolina is an absolutely unfair one. The impression sought to be produced by him is that the Senate had considered the matter and rejected it, whereas the truth is it went out on a point of order upon an expression in that bill which is not in this bill, and it would not have gone out on a point of order if the amendment had then been framed as it now is. It was a ruling based on the provision which made the amount "immediately available," and nothing else.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate did not make the appropriation, and the claim did go out. That same letter was here. Is it unfair to make that kind of a statement?

Mr. BACON. It is when the impression is sought to be conveyed that the Senate had passed upon the merits of this case and had rejected any favorable consideration of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was attempted——

Mr. BACON. The fact is that it went off on other considerations altogether.

Mr. OVERMAN. This claim has been here three or four times. It was attempted to get it through by getting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, who stated the truth about it, as did the Senator from Kansas. The case came here and it was ruled out on a point of order. The language may have been different. There was no appeal from the decision of the Chair; the claim was not appropriated for, and therefore it went out.

But, Mr. President, I was starting, in interrupting the Senator from Georgia, to state some facts in reference to this case when it came up. As I said, this was attempted to be done in conference; it was not argued in the House of Representatives or in the Senate. It came back here in a conference report. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] then made the point of order that the conference committee had no right to legislate in any such manner. I arose and asked the question, What services had these men performed? There had just been a scandal over this country in reference to a case in which lawyers had been allowed over a million dollars out of Indian funds. The whole country was full of the scandal. I simply rose and asked what services had been performed by these lawyers. No one said what services had been performed, except that they had been here time and time again before the Senate and the House of Representatives and before committees.

The Senator from Texas then drew from his desk an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that a contract for the performance of services before Congress was void, as such contract was against public policy. I read that and it is now in the debate. After that was done some Senators claimed that those lawyers ought to be allowed something for their services, although the contract was void on account of public policy. Then we agreed here upon the floor that we would send the case to the Court of Claims and that every lawyer who had performed services for these Indians should go into a proper court and establish his claim. They all went there. If Mr. Gordon did not go there it is his own fault; but, nevertheless, he did go there. The Senator from Georgia says he was allowed his $14,000. Now, a second time after that here comes his claim again, though this same debate had then occurred.

What right have we to take this money from the Indians just because they are Indians and because it is not a claim against the Government? It is our duty as Senators here, because these Indians are our wards, to stand by them just as well as we do by the other taxpayers of this country.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to reply for a moment to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I yield, certainly.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina speaks of a scandal. I do not know anything about the case to which he refers, but it will never be considered a scandal in any community or in any body of men that a fee of 10 per cent should be permitted in a case where there had been a recovery of a claim, the entire justice of which had in the beginning and for many years been utterly denied and repudiated by this Government; so that while there may have been other cases in which there were scandalous fees, this could not have been so considered. It is not, I think, exactly fair to endeavor to disparage the claim by a comparison of that kind. Especially so, when this contract was one made with these Indians with the careful approval of its terms by the Interior Department. That made it a legal contract.

Here is a case where the Government, not in a general way, but in its legislation, had said that it did not owe a dollar and that not a dollar should be paid, and, through the efforts of these two attorneys, Gordon and Maish, and those whom they employed, not only $1,500,000 was recovered for those Indians, of which otherwise they would not have had a cent——

Mr. OVERMAN. How was it recovered?

Mr. BACON. By getting Congress to pass a bill recognizing it, after Congress had refused to do so time and time again, and for more than 16 years refused it. By arguments before committees the matter was finally recognized as a legitimate claim against the Government, and $1,500,000 was recognized as the proper amount, and appropriated as the proper amount, for the payment of it. In addition to that, the principle being once settled, a still larger amount for other property resting upon the same title was awarded to these Indians, so that altogether the amount is nearly $4,000,000.

I want to call attention to one fact, and I really do not care about detaining the Senate with much more on this subject. Gordon and Maish employed Butler & Vale, and agreed that they should have a certain percentage of the fees. Maish died, and Gordon, for the reason which I have already mentioned and in the circumstances which I have already narrated, practically left the matter in charge of these men whom he had employed. One of them, from North Carolina, Mr. Butler, had a contract with Gordon, under which he was to receive a certain percentage of this fee. Gordon left to him the representation before Congress in the effort to secure this fee. He undertook to represent it before the courts; and when the award was made, Butler, if my information is correct—and I think it is—got all from that court he would have gotten if Gordon had collected his entire $150,000 and paid Butler the amount he was entitled to receive under his contract. Therefore this distinguished North Carolinian is in receipt of every dollar he would have gotten if the original $150,000 had been collected. After that is done this other distinguished North Carolinian, the Senator now opposing this claim, is perfectly content that the poor Georgian shall go without anything at all, his North Carolina friend having received everything which he would be entitled to receive if the full fee had been paid to Gordon under his contract.

Mr. LODGE. I should like——

Mr. OVERMAN. One minute, if the Senator please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Georgia has stated in his former speech——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. The North Carolina lawyer against whom the Senator thought I had some feeling had been a United States Senator. What I complain of is that men should go out of the United States Senate, loaf around Washington, get contracts from the Indians, and come here and try to get enormous amounts from the Indians by contracts which the Supreme Court says are void. I will show you the decision and how their contract is void. The Senator admits that the Georgia lawyer has done nothing but to go before the committee time and time again. A contract to get 10 per cent of a million dollars to appear before a committee is robbery of the Indians, I say.

Mr. BACON. But the unfortunate thing is that the North Carolinian got his part of it, and then the Senator is satisfied.

Mr. OVERMAN. The court did that; I did not do it. The court allowed your man $14,000.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss the merits of this case, because its merits have absolutely nothing whatever to do with the point of order; but I wish to call the Chair's attention, if the Chair will permit me, to a case in the Senate which is almost exactly like this, although it is not quite so strong. That was a case which occurred in 1909 in regard to a provision in the Indian appropriation bill for paying 10 per cent out of the loyal Creek fund to Mr. Peel, of Arkansas. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who has reminded me of the case, which I remember very well, raised the question of order that the amendment as amended proposed general legislation to a general appropriation bill, and was therefore not in order. This is what occurred:

Mr. LODGE raised a further question of order, viz, that this amendment as amended is a provision for a private claim, which can only be received to a general appropriation bill when it carries out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment, and inasmuch as no treaty stipulation is cited on the face of this amendment, it is therefore not in order.

The Vice President said:

The Chair has been greatly impressed by the strength of the argument of the friends of the amendment as to the equitable character of the claim. But in deciding the point of order the Chair is, of course, precluded from considering either the equitable nature of the claim or the supposed merit of the claim that is involved in the amendment.

The Chair is of the opinion that in determining the parliamentary question which is raised, it is impossible for him to go back of the act of Congress of 1903 and consider any agreements, awards, or settlements which may have been made prior thereto. The Congress has spoken upon the question, and it is not within the province of the Senate to set aside, nor is it within the province of the Chair to ignore, its deliberate, conclusive action. It is provided in the act as follows—

I shall not read that, for it is simply the provision of the act for the loyal Creek claims.

Congress, in order, apparently, to leave no doubt as to its purpose and the effect of the act, provided:

That said sum shall be accepted by said Indians in full payment and satisfaction of all claim * * *.

Unless this act has been very materially modified or repealed by a subsequent act it stands as the supreme law, and standing as it does it negatives the suggestion that the pending amendment is to carry out an existing law or treaty stipulation.

The Chair is clearly of opinion that the amendment can not be entertained under the third paragraph of Rule XVI. It proposes to change a general law. Therefore it is in the nature of general legislation, and is obnoxious to the rule.

The Chair sustained both points of order. Vice President Fairbanks was then the occupant of the chair.

Mr. President, it seems to me perfectly clear that this is a change of the existing law. I know that our rule is not like the House rule, which forbids any amendment changing existing law, while ours is against general legislation; but it seems to me to follow that, if you change a general act of Congress, the change proposed must be in the nature of general legislation. I do not see how that point can be escaped. I will not pause to argue the other question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it seems that there are precedents on both sides of this point of order relating to the point that it is a private claim. The attempt is made to except this case from the rule which prohibits a private claim from being incorporated on a general appropriation bill upon the ground that it is not a claim against the United States. I fail to see any merit in that argument. There is nothing in the rule of the Senate which makes an exception of claims which are not claims against the United States. The fact of the case is that this is a private claim which is proposed to be paid by the United States. It is said that it is proposed to pay it out of a special fund; but if there is any merit in the rule of the Senate which excludes private claims from being incorporated in general appropriation bills, it has twice the merit when it applies to funds which the United States is holding in trust for the Indians.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me there?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I wish the Senator would read the precise language of that rule, as he is arguing the point that the amendment is a private claim. The rule says "provide for a private claim." There is no suggestion that it should be an appropriation. The rule is purposely broad. If you provide for a private claim, no matter how you provide for it, it seems to me obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thank the Senator for his statement. It corroborates the point which I was attempting to make. The change of the application of that rule would be a change of the rule itself, the reading into the rule of something that the rule does not contain. If we are proposing here now to pay a claim which the United States is not liable for, then we must be paying a claim which the Indians are liable for, without consulting the Indians and without giving the Indians an opportunity to be heard.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has gone at some length into the merits of this claim, and he is justified in doing so because other Senators have gone into the merits of it, and a discussion of the merits of it in a way indirectly may be pertinent to the point of order. It seems that he bases the argument that this is an equitable claim on the ground that Mr. Butler took advantage of Mr. Gordon in the distribution of this fee. I do not see that that creates any obligation on the part of the United States to reimburse Mr. Gordon. If Mr. Butler took advantage of Mr. Gordon, broke faith with him, and took more of this money for his fee than he was entitled to receive, Mr. Gordon's claim is against Mr. Butler and not against the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. A man whose name is referred to in the Senate is almost powerless to protect himself. While I do not care to become involved in this controversy, and while I am in favor of paying Mr. Gordon this $25,000, I do want to say, in order that it may go into the RECORD, that I have been familiar with the history of this case from the beginning, and I can not feel that there is warrant for saying that Mr. Butler defrauded Mr. Gordon or anyone else in this case.

Mr. BACON. I have not said that he did.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I desire to say that I did not understand the Senator from Georgia to say that. I think we are sometimes somewhat careless and indifferent in our statements in the Senate. We forget that the RECORD is almost imperishable; we forget the circulation of the RECORD; and we forget how helpless a man is to protect himself when any charges are made against him in the RECORD. Thousands who never saw him may read these statements in the RECORD. I am not, as I have said, taking any part in this matter, although I do feel that Mr. Gordon should have this $25,000, and if I have an opportunity I will vote to give it to him.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the RECORD show that Mr. Butler got exactly what the court allowed him?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. Butler got what the court allowed him; yes. The court allowed the attorneys in this case $63,000 to be distributed among them. Mr. Gordon undertook the case early in its history, before any of the others were interested in it, at a time when one of the leading Senators in this Chamber had declared that the claim had no merit, that Congress would not recognize it, and that the department would not recognize it; yet these men worked upon that case until the court decided that the Indians were entitled to the south half of the reservation, and awarded them $1,500,000 for the northern half of the reservation. The court made the division of the fund.

Mr. BACON. I have not said any words that indicated to the contrary.

Mr. CLAPP. I know the Senator has not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota if he does not think that $63,000 was fair compensation for the legal services rendered?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think it begins to be reasonable compensation for the services rendered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator know what these attorneys did, what legal services they rendered?

Mr. CLAPP. I know in a general way they had to take this case to the courts. They had to make the proof, and they had to establish the case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To what court did they take it?

Mr. CLAPP. The Court of Claims.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. They did not take the Colville case to the Court of Claims; they only took their own case to that court. The Colville case was settled by Congress.

Mr. CLAPP. They had to take their case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; on a quantum meruit. That is all they went to the court about—their own fees.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Washington allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The only case, as I understand from what has been said here, that these attorneys took to the Court of Claims was their own claim for compensation. That is the only matter they took to the Court of Claims, and Congress authorized them to do so.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly.

Mr. NELSON. They performed no other legal services; the only court they attended was the Court of Claims; and the only case they had in the Court of Claims was their own claim for compensation, and not the claim of the Indians.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true——

Mr. NELSON. And the fact is, according to the statements made, that at first the claim of the Indians made no impression on Congress, but, subsequently, after all these assistant attorneys came in, they succeeded in converting Congress to their view. Does not a case such as that come within the spirit of the decision of the Supreme Court that that kind of service is not legal service and that it is contrary to the spirit of the law? The court would not have allowed the attorneys' claim in this case but for the fact that Congress consented to it.

Mr. CLAPP. Exactly; but when Congress authorized the attorneys to go into the Court of Claims and there by proof establish the value of their services, Congress waived whatever there was as to the technical want of legality in the service they had previously performed. But I simply rose to say——

Mr. BACON. I want to call the attention of the Senator, if he will pardon an interruption, to the fact——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BACON. This was under a contract which had been approved by the Government.

Mr. CLAPP. That is a fact, of course, that has appeared time and again in the discussion of this case.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, referring to the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], I think the Senator will fail to find anything in what I have said in criticism of Mr. Butler or Mr. Gordon or anyone else. I know nothing whatever about the private arrangement between Mr. Gordon and Mr. Butler. I understood the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to say that Mr. Gordon had left the presentation of the claim for attorneys' fees to Mr. Butler, and that, as a result of that, Mr. Gordon had not obtained his share of the fee.

Mr. BACON. I do not claim that Mr. Butler was responsible for the fact that Mr. Gordon did not secure a larger award from the court. I simply stated the fact that he had not received the same amount. Mr. Gordon was not present, and Mr. Gordon has never received a dollar under that award.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The court allowed Mr. Gordon $14,000, it allowed Mr. Butler $20,000, and Mr. Vale $10,000. A great number of attorneys were employed in this same matter, and in the aggregate a sum was awarded, as the Senator from North Carolina, I think, has stated, of $63,000. Herbert J. May received $3,000; F. C. Robertson, $2,000; and Daniel B. Henderson, $5,000.

It is said here that there was some dispute as to whether the Indians were entitled to this money. That would require going back and investigating the Indian claims, which of course, the Senate is not prepared to do in the consideration of this claim for an attorney's fee by Mr. Gordon. I fail to see how there could have been any serious doubt about the title of the Indians to the money for lands which they occupied and which had been set aside for them by treaty with the United States Government; and all that this great corps of attorneys did, who received $63,000 for their services, was to secure to the Indians an appropriation of money for lands which the Government had taken from the Indians for a reservation which had been set aside to them by a treaty signed by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. He has raised a question that it will probably be proper to consider in connection with this matter. First, the Government undertook to make a treaty with the Colville Indians for the opening of the northern half of their reservation. That treaty was agreed to. It came before the Senate for consideration, and the Senate, after very considerable discussion, disregarded the treaty, and the reservation was opened by an act of Congress. It was the first case, if I remember correctly, where the Congress took the position that they might take Indian lands by an act of Congress instead of taking them under the provisions of a treaty.

Mr. CLAPP. That is right.

Mr. HEYBURN. That covered the north half of the Colville Reservation. That question was taken into the courts. I tried it before the United States court in the case of Northern View Mining Co. v. Bubb, I think, and there is an elaborate opinion filed by the judge of that court in that case. It afterwards went to the circuit court of appeals. This was a good many years ago.

Now, Congress disregarded the treaty rights of the Indians, and disregarded the treaty, and determined the amount the Indians should receive for this land by an act of Congress rather than through the treaty. In other words, they took it out of the hands of the Indians entirely and violated all of the precedents up to that time.

It then became a live question as to whether or not Congress should do it or could do it, and notwithstanding the treaty, Congress opened the north half of the Colville Reservation and fixed the compensation which should be paid to the Indians for that land and the terms of the cession. That cession has been sustained in the courts. In other words, the courts recognize the right of Congress to disregard the treaty rights of the Indians, and out of that all of this controversy has arisen.

Now, of course we can not go back upon the act of Congress opening this reservation; we can not do that because it is something that has passed into the fixed law of the land. So that there was nothing for anyone to do to secure any further compensation to those Indians. It was payable as a draft upon the Government, and when the controversy finally arose they thought—the Indians did not think so; if you could hear their side of the story you would understand how they were led to believe that Congress could not be trusted at all. They were led to believe that they were at the mercy of Congress and had no rights whatever, and so a lot of attorneys, insisting that their services were necessary, inveigled themselves into this controversy; and now this grows out of the violation of the treaty with those Indians.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will, although I have not the floor.

Mr. BACON. I have not the papers before me, but I am sure the Senator is incorrect in one particular. The Senator says the Government disregarded the treaty and took the lands of the Indians by act of Congress for certain consideration.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what it did.

Mr. BACON. In fact, they took the lands and denied obligation for any consideration at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. They provided for a consideration.

Mr. BACON. Never. On the contrary I assert it, and I will, if time permits, produce the evidence of it——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. One moment. I will not trespass long upon the time of the Senator from Washington. I want to finish my sentence.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield briefly to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. They passed the act of Congress providing for the opening of the land and taking these lands and denying any obligation to pay a cent, on the contrary absolutely repudiating the possibility of any claim on the part of these Indians; and no less a man than Orville H. Platt, one of the authorities on the subject of everything that related to Indians, and one of the ablest and most prominent men who ever sat in this Chamber, contended that the Government did not owe these Indians a dollar. It was not a case where the Government had taken the land by act of Congress and provided they would pay a certain amount and where the Indians were led to believe nothing would be paid to them under that contract. It was a case where the Government had denied that it had to pay anything, and had asserted the right to take the property without paying anything, and it was 15 or 16 years after the taking of the property before the right of payment was recognized by the Government—the right of payment of anything, of a dollar or of a penny.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is going into the treaty with the Colville Indians, going back to the question of this reservation, which had been set aside to the Indians, recognized by the Government as their country, and which had been made the basis of a treaty between the Government of the United States and the Indians, in which treaty it was provided that the Indians should be compensated for the lands which were taken from them and opened to the settlement of white people—questions which are not concerned in any way at all either in the point of order or in the merits of the claim of Mr. Gordon for legal services. Mr. Gordon has presented his claim for all the legal services that he rendered in that case. It has been adjudicated in the court constituted for the purpose of hearing such claims. All the other attorneys have had their claims adjudicated. The claims of these parties and what proportion should be allowed each one have been adjudicated. So much for the merits of the case.

I simply repeat upon the point of order that the amendment is obnoxious to the rule against the insertion of a private claim in a general appropriation bill. There is nothing in the language of that rule upon which any exception can be based. The amendment is also obnoxious to the rule against general legislation, because it can not be denied that this whole matter has been covered by general legislation, been disposed of, and the amount he is entitled to has been allowed. If we are going to open that up again, we do it, as the Senator from Massachusetts said, by a statute which in effect modifies or repeals a general law which has already been passed by Congress, and, of course, in doing so it is necessarily general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the Chair undertook to rule and was interrupted by debate, the Chair was not aware of some facts which have developed in the discussion since that time.

The Chair was cognizant of the ruling made by the present Vice President on a similar amendment, which was ruled out of order on the ground that it was general legislation because it contained certain words which placed it in the category of general legislation, and which words do not appear in the present amendment. The Chair did not recall, if the questions were raised at that time, the points that have been raised by the Senator from Kansas in the debate that has recently closed. As before stated, the Chair is familiar with the ruling of President pro tempore Frye and President pro tempore Badger that a claim of this kind does not come under the inhibition of Rule XVI, relating to private claims.

But in the debate which has occurred during the last hour very serious questions have been raised upon which Senators entertain widely differing opinions, both as to the point of order and as to the facts in this case. The mind of the Chair has been disturbed, and it is not an easy matter to form an opinion sufficiently clear to make a ruling on the question without giving the matter more consideration than can be given to it now. Therefore the Chair takes the liberty, under the provision of Rule XVI, to submit the matter to the Senate, the question being, Is the amendment in order on an appropriation bill? Senators agreeing that the amendment is in order will say "aye"; those of a contrary mind will say "no." The noes appear to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is——

Mr. BACON. I ask for a division.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is one matter which cropped out in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior which I think has not been sufficiently brought to the attention of the Senate. It appears that this contract described certain services that the attorneys were to render, fixing the compensation when rendered, to be paid out of the amount recovered and in proportion to it. There was also a limitation of time, that the service was to be rendered within a given time. The service was not rendered within the specified time, but the attorneys continued to serve in their capacity attending upon committees of Congress explaining this matter, hoping that some turn would be taken by which they would be compensated.

At the time the payment was made by Congress no contract existed with the attorneys. The assumption of the court must have been that the services were to be measured by the rule quantum meruit. That was brought to my mind from listening to the letter from Mr. Secretary Ballinger, written about two years since.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question a division is demanded.

There were on a division—ayes 10, noes 21.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate decides that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 46, after line 13, I desire to submit a proposed amendment which is accompanied by a request of the department.

The SECRETARY. On page 46, after line 13, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to approve the findings of the district court of the State of Oklahoma for Kay County in the matter of the determination of the heirs of Buck Bill, a deceased Tonkawa Indian; to make an equitable partition of the estate among such heirs; and in his discretion to issue patents in fee to the adult heirs for their respective portions of said estate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. On page 68, at the end of the Wisconsin items, I offered an amendment this morning. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted. It relates to the Pottawatomie Indians.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, at the end of the Wisconsin items, the following amendment was agreed to:

That for the purpose of carrying into effect certain treaty stipulations between the United States and the United Nation of Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatomie Indians, and for the purpose of carrying into effect the act of June 25, 1864 (13 Stat. L., p. 172), the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of that portion of the Wisconsin Band of Pottawatomie Indians now resident in the States of Wisconsin and Michigan the sum of $22,368, the same being the interest upon the proportionate share of these Indians in annuities and moneys of the Pottawatomie Tribe in which they have not shared as set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Interior to the House of Representatives embodied in House Document No. 830, Sixtieth Congress, first session, and said sum shall be immediately available for said purpose, which said interest shall be distributed per capita under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior to the members of said band now resident in the States of Wisconsin and Michigan, or shall be expended in his discretion for their benefit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask that the amendment be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAPP. At the same place I offer the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, after line 7, insert:

That there be, and there is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $22,366.95 to those members of the Wisconsin Band of Pottawatomie Indians now resident in Wisconsin and Michigan, the same being 5 per cent interest for one year upon the sum of $447,339, the proportionate share of these Indians in annuities and moneys of the Pottawatomie Tribe in which they have not shared, as set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Interior to the House of Representatives, embodied in House Document No. 830, Sixtieth Congress, first session. Said sum shall be distributed per capita under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior or shall be expended in his discretion for their benefit.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. On looking over the bill, in view of the fact that it will be passed subsequently to the 1st of July, it has occurred to me that, on page 47, line 7, the word "ensuing" should be changed to "current."

I therefore move to amend the committee amendment, on line 7, page 45, by striking out the word "ensuing" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "current."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. The original amendment has been already agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not require a reconsideration of the amendment for that purpose. By unanimous consent, the change will be made. The amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. That completes the suggestions of the committee. I understand the Senator from Oklahoma wishes to offer some amendments.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment to the sections just amended upon motion of the Senator from Minnesota. Are we now in Committee of the Whole or in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORE. I presume I would have to move to reconsider that amendment, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be necessary.

Mr. GORE. Then I move to reconsider the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate reconsider the vote by which it agreed to the amendment to section 18. Without objection, the motion to reconsider prevails.

Mr. GORE. Now, I ask the Secretary to read the amendment, and during the reading I will suggest two or three verbal changes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment, as requested.

The SECRETARY. Under the heading of "Five Civilized Tribes," on page 46, the committee propose to strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive, and to insert a new section 18, as follows:

SEC. 18. For expenses of administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, Oklahoma, and the compensation of employees, $174,000.

For salaries and expenses of district agents for the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma and other employees connected with the work of such agents, $100,000: Provided, That during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, no moneys shall be expended from the tribal funds belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes except for schools for the current year and for the equalization of allotments, per capita, or other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes.

Mr. GORE. One amendment I desire to move is to transpose those two clauses.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, I will undertake to assist him by reading the amendment. He moves to take out, on page 47, the following words, in lines 8, 9, and 10:

For the equalization of allotments, per capita, or other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes—

And insert them after the word "except," on line 7, following such insertion with the word "and," so that it would read, beginning with line 7:

Five Civilized Tribes except for the equalization of allotments, per capita, or other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes, and for schools for the current year.

I understand that to be the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Yes; that is one of the amendments I desire to offer.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after the word "except," in line 7, the following words occurring in lines 8, 9, and 10:

For the equalization of allotments, per capita, or other payments authorized by law to individual members of the respective tribes—

And also to insert the word "and."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. I will ask the Secretary now to proceed with the reading, continuing from the word "salaries."

The Secretary read as follows:

And the salaries and contingent expenses of the governors, chiefs, assistant chiefs, secretaries, interpreters, and mining trustees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and attorneys of said tribes.

Mr. GORE. I wish to submit an amendment to that. It should be "mining trustees of the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes." The language of the bill is, "mining trustees of the Five Civilized Tribes." There are no such officers for the Five Civilized Tribes. It is only the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes that have mining trustees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "Five Civilized Tribes" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. I now move to transpose the phrase "current year" to a position after "Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after the words "the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes" the words "for the current year."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Now I will ask the Secretary to proceed with the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

Employed under contract approved by the President, without specific appropriation by Congress, except as hereinafter provided: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to continue the tribal schools of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and to use funds arising from royalties on coal and asphalt for their maintenance.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think the last clause there, from "Provided" on, is covered by the preceding provision, and I believe I will raise a point of order to that provision.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senator is falling into confusion. My judgment would be to suggest to him that he let the matter stand, and if there is any question of that kind it can be settled in conference.

Mr. GORE. There has been some little confusion or controversy upon that point. That policy is now being pursued, as I understand. These moneys are being used for the purpose of maintaining these schools.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but I understand the department holds that there is at least very serious doubt as to its authority to use moneys for this purpose without this direct authorization.

Mr. GORE. Yes; and a great many of these Indians are unwilling to have the law made explicit. That is the reason why I raise the point of order. It undoubtedly would be subject to a point of order, I think.

Mr. CLAPP. On the other hand, I understand some of them desire it. If there is any conflict about it, I shall be glad to call the Senator's attention to it when we get into conference.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I rise to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota as to what is implied in that. It is difficult to gather the force of the amendment. It seems that there is a reservation in that paragraph in favor of some attorneys. How is that?

Mr. CLAPP. There are certain attorneys who are regularly employed, at a salary of $5,000 a year, under contract approved by the President. At the beginning of this section—it is somewhat involved as it reads, although I think it can be all straightened out in conference—there was a limitation placed upon this appropriation that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, no moneys should be expended from the tribal funds belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes except for certain purposes then enumerated. One of those purposes was the equalization of allotments, per capita, or other payments; another was the salaries and contingent expenses of the governors, chiefs, assistant chiefs, secretaries, interpreters, and mining trustees of the tribes, and the attorneys whose contracts are approved by the President, and the schools that are also included in this exception. I would very strongly urge the Senator to let the matter go into conference in that shape.

Mr. GORE. It is my own theory that these appropriations ought to be made in an annual budget, and the necessary sums ought to be annually appropriated by Congress. I do not think it wise to vest the Secretary of the Interior with plenary powers, unlimited as to time and as to amount, with reference to these schools. I am very decidedly of the opinion that there ought to be annual appropriations. I have no objection to them as annual appropriations, but I do not think it wise to insert a provision here without any limitation.

Mr. CLAPP. I am very quick to accept the suggestion of the Senator. As I understand the situation now, the latter clause could be for only one year, while the others are annual, in the nature of a continuing matter, as suggested by the Committee on Appropriations. If there is any question about the matter, I shall be very glad to correct it.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, the last provision is entirely without limitation as to amount or as to time.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, after the word "maintenance," in line 19, I move the insertion of the words "for one year."

Mr. GORE. That is all right. Just say "for the current year."

Mr. CLAPP. "For the current year," then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "maintenance," in line 19, it is proposed to insert the words "for the current year."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Now I move the adoption of the amendment, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have another amendment which I desire to send to the desk.

I may state, by way of preliminary, that a bill has passed the present Congress providing for the sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations—a tract comprising about half a million acres of land. It happens that there are several small cemeteries situated in that section. There is no provision under existing law, for the reservation of these cemeteries. The amendment which I send to the desk provides for excepting those cemeteries.

I will add that accompanying the amendment there is a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD. It need not be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 49, line 4, after the word "resold," it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That where any cemetery now exists the land within said cemetery, together with land adjoining the same, where necessary, not exceeding 20 acres in the aggregate to any one cemetery and where a church was in existence on February 19, 1912, land not exceeding 1 acre for each church, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be sold to the proper party, association, or corporation under such terms, conditions, and regulations as he may prescribe, provided application to purchase the same for such purpose is made within 90 days from date hereof.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Oklahoma to request also that the accompanying letter be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GORE. Yes; I do not care to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered, without objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 18, 1912.

Hon. R. J. GAMBLE,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

SIR: In response to your request of April 3, 1912, for a report on S. 6078, introduced in the Senate on March 28, 1912, by Mr. OWEN, of Oklahoma, and being "A bill amending the act entitled 'An act to provide for the sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and for other purposes,' approved February 19, 1912," I have the honor to invite your attention to the fact that the above bill, being an amendment to the act of Congress approved February 19, 1912 (Public, No. 91), passed the Senate on April 5, 1912. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., 2d sess., vol. 48, No. 97, for Friday, Apr. 5, 1912, p. 4569.) However, the amendment as adopted provides only for the sale of adjoining land to cemeteries, but makes no provision for setting aside the land covered by existing cemeteries on the surface of the segregated coal-land area, nor is there any provision for such sale under existing law. In the same connection it is suggested that a provision should also be made in the proviso for land not exceeding 1 acre for church purposes where churches have already been established.

I have recommended to the chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs that in lieu of the proviso in S. 6078 there be inserted the following:

"And provided further, That where any cemetery now exists the land within said cemetery, together with land adjoining the same, where necessary, not exceeding 20 acres in the aggregate to any one cemetery, and where a church was in existence on February 19, 1912, land not exceeding 1 acre for each church, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be sold to the proper party, association, or corporation under such terms, conditions, and regulations as he may prescribe, provided application to purchase the same for such purpose is made within 90 days from date hereof."

Respectfully,

SAMUEL ADAMS,
First Assistant Secretary.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, at the end of line 13, insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construct suitable steel and concrete wagon bridges, with approaches thereto, across the Gila and San Carlos Rivers on the White Mountain or San Carlos Indian Reservation, in the State of Arizona, for the use and accommodation of the Indians and the general traveling public on the said Indian reservation; that the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to select the most practicable available sites for the said bridges at points on said rivers; that the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make all necessary regulations to carry out this act, and for the purpose of carrying its provisions into effect there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order against that amendment. It has not been estimated for by the department.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I recognize that the point of order is good. I know that the measure is favored by the department. While there has been no estimate made, I offered the amendment with the hope that the Senator might be gracious enough to our suffering class to have withheld the point of order and let the amendment go.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will please state the ground of his point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order on the ground that the item was not estimated for by the department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 24565, the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 3, after line 8, to insert:

That all officers of the Navy who, since the 3d day of March, 1899, have been advanced or may hereafter be advanced in grade or rank pursuant to law shall be allowed the pay and allowances of the higher grade or rank from the dates stated in their commissions.

Mr. BRISTOW. I raise the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation. It is advancing all officers to a grade higher upon retirement than they held.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the ground on which the Senator from Kansas makes the point of order?

Mr. BRISTOW. That it is general legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas makes the point of order that the amendment just read is general legislation, not coming within the rule. The Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 20, to insert:

The Auditor for the Navy Department is directed to allow payments made to hospital stewards who were granted permanent appointments as of date of May 13, 1908, which have heretofore been disallowed by reason of a decision of the Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury dated December 29, 1910, and to pay them out of the appropriations for "Pay of the Navy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 3, to strike out:

That hereafter any officer retired under the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of the act approved March 3, 1899, an act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States, shall be retired with the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the grade from which he is retired.

And insert:

That hereafter commissioned officers of the staff corps of the Navy who are graduates of the Naval Academy below the rank of captain shall be promoted in rank with the officer of the line with whom or next after whom they take precedence on the list of order of precedence of the Navy, and to carry out this provision temporary changes shall be made, when necessary, in the numbers of the various grades and ranks established by law for the staff corps: Provided, That there shall be no other promotion in grade or rank in any staff corps except in accordance with this act, and all laws and acts in conflict with this provision are hereby repealed: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held to increase the total number of officers in any staff corps as now fixed by existing laws and provided for in this act.

Mr. BRISTOW. I make the same point of order on that amendment—that it is general legislation.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Senator to let the amendment go over until the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who wishes to be here when it is considered, is present.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am perfectly willing to let the ruling go over, but I want to make the point now, so that if I should be out of the Chamber when it is again taken up I may not lose my right to interpose the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. That is understood.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment can be passed over and the point of order reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order will be reserved and the amendment passed over.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 11, after the word "other," to strike out "dependent relative of" and insert "person previously designated by," and in line 12, after the words "enlisted man," to strike out "previously designated by him," so as to make the clause read:

That hereafter immediately upon official notification of the death, from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Navy and Marine Corps the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and, if no widow, to the children, and, if there be no children, to any other person previously designated by such officer or enlisted man, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death, less $75 in the case of an officer and $35 in the case of an enlisted man, to defray expenses of interment, and the residue, if any, of the amount reserved shall be paid subsequently to the designated person.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 15 on page 6.

Mr. PERKINS. On page 6, line 1, I move to strike out the word "line" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nine," so as to read:

Shore-duty pay and allowances of the rear admiral of the lower nine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 15, to insert:

That hereafter the pay of the secretary to the Admiral of the Navy shall be at the rate of $3,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 18, to insert:

Hereafter any naval officer on the retired list may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be ordered to such duty as he may be able to perform at sea or on shore, and while so employed in time of peace shall receive the pay and allowances of an officer of the active list of the grade from which he was retired: Provided, That no such retired officer so employed on active duty shall receive, in time of peace, any greater pay and allowances than the pay and allowances which are now or may hereafter be provided by law for a lieutenant commander on the active list of like length of service: And provided further, That any such officer whose retired pay exceeds the highest pay and allowances of the grade of lieutenant commander shall, while so employed in time of peace, receive his retired pay only, in lieu of all other pay and allowances.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am satisfied that the Senators on this side of the Chamber, there being so few here, do not know that this bill is up. I think they ought to know it. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PERKINS. I think we can make progress by going on with the reading and passing over any amendments to which there may be objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Page	Swanson
Bacon	Gardner	Penrose	Thornton
Briggs	Gronna	Perkins	Tillman
Bristow	Heyburn	Pomerene	Townsend
Burnham	Johnston, Ala.	Sanders	Warren
Catron	Lodge	Simmons	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Clapp	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Fall	Overman	Smoot

Mr. PERKINS. Before the result is announced I will state that the committee has no objection to the bill going over until Friday, at the close of the morning business, and I will therefore agree to an adjournment with that understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the bill be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. LODGE. No; the Senator from California gave notice that he will move to take up the bill on Friday immediately after the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be the effect of laying it aside. It is the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will withhold that motion I will explain to him that there are a number of Senators who desire a brief executive session.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-three Senators only are present. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Friday, July 5, 1912, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 3, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast never forsaken us, blessed be Thy name forever. Inspire us by Thy holy presence to be faithful servants unto Thee, rich in thought, noble in deed, giving ourselves to those things which seemeth best in Thy sight; and with perfect faith and confidence in the overruling of Thy providence help us to submit ourselves to all the vicissitudes of life, assured that all things work together for good to them that love God. For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as to-morrow is a legal holiday, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TO CONVEY TO WILMINGTON, N. C., PORTION OF MARINE-HOSPITAL RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The call rests with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The unfinished business is the bill S. 6603, which is on the Union Calendar, and the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6603) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the board of education of New Hanover County, N. C., portion of marine-hospital reservation not needed for marine-hospital purposes.

Mr. MANN. The bill has not been read in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was misinformed, then. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to convey to the board of education of New Hanover County, State of North Carolina, the following-described tract of land, being a portion of the marine-hospital reservation in the city of Wilmington, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, is no longer needed for marine-hospital purposes, to wit, 34.1 acres of land, more or less, covering six whole and three one-half city blocks lying east of Tenth Street, in the city of Wilmington, county of New Hanover, and State of North Carolina, such conveyance to be upon condition that the land shall be used exclusively for industrial-school purposes, the title thereof to revert to the United States if at any time the land or any building erected thereon shall no longer be used for such purpose.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] desire recognition?

Mr. MANN. I thought that some gentleman in charge of the bill would desire recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, not hearing anyone in charge of the bill who desires recognition, will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a number of years ago the Government purchased a piece of property at Wilmington, N. C., for which it paid cash, for a marine-hospital site—a tract of about 40 acres. It is now proposed to donate to the board of education of the county, at Wilmington, 34 acres of this land for nothing. The land which it is proposed to donate is valued at $22,500, which is believed to be a conservative value. The Government paid for the tract 50 years ago $6,500. What excuse can anyone give for the Government to purchase a piece of land for its own use, for which it pays cash, and to donate the major portion of the land to one of the municipalities of a State for no consideration whatever? I shall be glad to hear any reason that can be given.

Mr. HAMMOND. What was the total acreage bought?

Mr. MANN. About 50 acres were bought, and it is proposed to donate 34 acres, and to donate them undoubtedly for a good purpose—for a school of some kind. But why should the General Government purchase land in order to turn it over to a State or any municipality or other organization of the State without consideration?

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. What is the purpose of turning this land over?

Mr. MANN. To be used for an industrial school.

Mr. CULLOP. Without any consideration?

Mr. MANN. Without any consideration.

Mr. CULLOP. What has it been used for by the United States heretofore?

Mr. MANN. The Government purchased in 1857 a little less than 50 acres, upon which it located the marine hospital used for marine hospital purposes. Those services only occupy something less than 4 acres, and it is said, and truthfully said, that although this bill should pass it would leave 15 acres there, and it is very likely that the Government would not be discommoded by turning over this land to the county, but I can see no reason why the county should not pay at least the proportionate share of the original cost of the land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman examined the precedents for bills like this? Is it not a fact that if he will examine into the matter he will find that in the Western States, in numerous instances, public lands have been given to cities and towns—public lands and Indian lands to cities and towns and municipalities, and sometimes to States—for schools and other purposes, hospitals, and so forth?

Mr. MANN. Well, I very much regret that the committee presided over by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] has on several occasions reported bills to grant Indian lands or other lands, and other committees have reported bills to grant other lands for various purposes. A number of those have not been passed, and Congress in recent years has, usually at least, refused to pass such bills where no consideration was proposed unless there were very exceptional circumstances existing, which I do not believe exist in this case.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly. I yield to any gentleman who desires information.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In the Fifty-first Congress, I believe, a bill, which I think came from the Committee on Public Lands, passed this House and was approved, taking part of the public domain, the property of the people of the whole United States, and devoting it to educational purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was simply asking the gentleman from Illinois if there were not numerous precedents for bills of this kind, and if other bills of like character have not been passed by this House?

Mr. MANN. The Government possesses the title to two sections in each township of the public land in the public-land States, to be devoted to public purposes, and it frequently grants additional land for educational purposes. But it is not the custom, although it has sometimes been done, for the Government to give away land which it has purchased and for which it has paid. Take the case over in New York, which was referred to the other day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] when another bill was up—a bill which came from the committee of which I was formerly a member, and of which the gentleman [Mr. ADAMSON] presiding over this Committee of the Whole is now the chairman—in reference to conveying a portion of a lighthouse site in New York, where they wanted it for road purposes. We made them pay $50,000 or $60,000, or some such amount as that, for the small portion of land which was taken.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he understands that this tract of 34 acres which it is proposed to give away is worth $22,000—the whole tract of land?

Mr. MANN. Well, there might be a question about that; but from the statement I had understood that the tract to be given away was worth——

Mr. FOSTER. Twenty-two thousand dollars?

Mr. MANN. Yes. Whether it really was or not I do not know.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman understand that this land is within the corporate limits of Wilmington, a city of 30,000 or 40,000 people?

Mr. MANN. I understand so.

Mr. FOSTER. And we are asked now to give away to the city this tract of 34 acres, which is worth $22,000? That is the proposition?

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is the proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. And for which the Government paid for the whole tract $6,500 50 years ago?

Mr. MANN. Yes; $6,500. I would not, so far as I am concerned, insist upon the city paying for the present value of the land, but it seems to me that the city ought voluntarily to be willing to pay the proportion which the land granted bears to the whole of the original purchase price of the land.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FRENCH. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the city or county in which this land is situated should pay its proportionate share of the original cost of this land, I will say that the county will be glad to do that, as was brought out in the committee, providing there would be granted to the county that which would naturally be granted when a payment of that kind is made—a deed in fee simple to the land. There is a reservation in the present bill that if the land ceases to be used for the purpose contemplated in the bill it shall revert to the Government, and it was owing to that condition that the committee felt that we should not attach to the county the obligation of paying even a proportionate share of the value of the land. I am satisfied—in fact it was represented to the committee—that the county will gladly pay its proportionate share of the cost of the land if a deed be made in fee simple to the county.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but if the deed is to be made in fee simple to the county it ought to pay the present value of the land.

Mr. FRENCH. Well, the committee looks at the question from this point of view: The purpose for which the grant is made is for an industrial school for the education of the negro population of that section of the country. That is a State that has not received the liberal grants of land for educational and other purposes that Western States have received. The very purpose of this grant is to aid the citizens there who do not bear a considerable portion of the burden of taxation of the county and State government. The committee felt that to make this grant would be not only in line with the precedents, but that it would be doing a right and equitable thing to the South, to the State of North Carolina, and to the people who will be benefited. We can well afford to make this grant without cost on condition that if the land shall cease to be used for the purpose of the grant it shall revert to the United States. The land is not needed further for the original purpose for which it was bought.

More than that, it has been suggested that the county should pay, if it is to receive the title in fee simple, a proportionate share of the present value of the land. I would say that it hardly seems right that the Government should want to make a profit on a real-estate investment in selling the land for school purposes. If any cost is to be taxed up to the county, it should simply be the proportionate share of the original cost of the land to the Government.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Idaho, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, if he does not think that the United States Government is entitled to some consideration where property that it owns has increased in value?

Mr. FRENCH. Unless you want to take into consideration the suggestion I made a few minutes ago, that the Government has acted generously with other States, has made grants to similar institutions in other States, and that here is a section of the country that has not received very much of grants of this character. More than that, the grant is not for the State generally or for the white people, but rather for the benefit of the colored population of that section. It seems to me that it would be a generous thing to do for the Government to make the grant on the basis provided in the bill; or, if you are going to impose a charge for the property, it seems reasonable that you limit it to the proportionate cost that the amount of land granted the county bears to the original cost to the Government of the entire original tract.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is very natural that the gentleman who has just addressed the House should believe that wherever the Government owns land, and the State or any local or municipal organization under the State desires it, that we ought to grant it. Because we have been so liberal to the Western States the Representatives from that section have come to believe that if they want any portion of the public domain in the State they are entitled to it without any compensation. But it is going a little further to say that when anybody wants land which the Government does not own the Government ought to buy the land, pay for it out of the Federal Treasury, and then donate it. The Government purchased this land for its use as a marine-hospital site and paid $6,500 for it. Whenever the Government owns a piece of land that it does not need, whether it has been purchased or reserved, the moment it is seen that the Government does not need it the local counties, towns, cities, or States say that they want it, and ask that it be given to them. Now, does the gentleman from Idaho believe that we ought to adopt that as the policy of the Government?

Mr. FRENCH. I would not lay that down as a policy, but it seems to me that with all the circumstances surrounding this particular case it would be a proper course to pass the bill as reported by the committee. It would be impossible for this industrial school to be established or to be enlarged—because there is an industrial school there at this time—except at great expense. This is a tract of land that by reason of belonging to the Government has been reserved from passing into private ownership, and it practically adjoins the property that is being used now for industrial school purposes.

Mr. KENDALL. By the State?

Mr. FRENCH. By the county for the education of the colored population of the county, and I see no bad precedent that can be established by the passage of this bill.

Mr. KENDALL. The land to be applied to public purposes?

Mr. FRENCH. It will be applied to public purposes, certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield while I ask a question of the gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There appears to be nothing in the report indicating any intent to erect a school or to carry out the purpose to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. FRENCH. I will say that the bill itself provides that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What pledge or promise has the committee?

Mr. FRENCH. The bill provides that it shall be granted to the county for industrial school purposes and also provides that in the event of its ceasing to be used for that purpose it shall revert to the Government. It is because of that provision that the committee thought it was not necessary to charge the county for the land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has any suggestion come from any one that the county really wants to build a school there, or that it proposes to build one, should the land be granted?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, the committee had a hearing upon that subject from the Senator who introduced the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is nothing in the report to indicate any purpose on the part of anybody to build a school.

Mr. FRENCH. I think that is fully covered in the bill itself, together with the reservation that shall it not be used for that purpose the title shall revert to the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But there is no direct proposition that a school is to be built. The land is to be transferred on condition that one shall be built?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, the Government is offering an inducement for the county to erect schools by giving the land. What does the county say about it? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. FRENCH. It is well understood, as we were assured by the Senator who introduced the bill, when he appeared before the committee, that the county proposes to build this institution.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] permit me to ask a further question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury makes no recommendation upon this subject at all. His letter makes no reservation, but merely submits the facts.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; submits the facts that a certain amount of land is used for marine-hospital purposes, and we are leaving for that purpose a large amount besides. We propose in this bill to grant to this industrial school an amount from the land that is not used at all by the Government for marine-hospital purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not the policy of the Treasury Department to hold onto that land which it has, rather than to let go of it?

Mr. FRENCH. I think there can be no good policy in holding onto this land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asking if it is not the policy now of the Treasury not to dispose of these public lands?

Mr. FRENCH. I think wherever the land could be used for some good purpose by the Government that the Government ought to retain the land; but these lands are so far away from the harbor that they can not ordinarily be used for the purpose of an immigration station or anything of that character. That question was brought out in the committee, and there seems to be no purpose for which the Government could use the land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman brought in a bill the other day which provides for a transfer of a piece of land in San Francisco which had formerly been used for marine-hospital purposes. I would like to have the gentleman explain why, when a bill is introduced, as one has been by me for three or four successive Congresses, for the sale of a piece of land for which there is absolutely no public use, that we can not get a report on the bill?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman were proposing to give it away the committee would undoubtedly report it very quickly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In this instance we asked that the land be sold. It is of no further public use.

Mr. MANN. I know, but to sell anything and get cash for it offends the sensibilities of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In this instance the Treasury reported against the sale of land for which it has had no use for nearly 100 years.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, I am not familiar with the particular bill to which the gentleman refers, but I am addressing myself to the merits of this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it bears very strongly upon the policy of the Department of the Treasury, which, according to the letter in this North Carolina case, seems to be that it is just as well to hold on to the land.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask if there is anybody else behind the proposed industrial school save the county?

Mr. FRENCH. It was not so indicated to the committee; no.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any donation or donations that this industrial school will receive—any donation from any source other than that of the county?

Mr. FRENCH. I am not familiar with that; I could not answer the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any other colored school in the county?

Mr. FRENCH. I am not familiar with that question; I do not know.

Mr. FOWLER. And is it to be exclusively for colored children?

Mr. FRENCH. That is my understanding from the general hearings the committee held.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the proposed cost of the building and the capacity thereof for educational purposes?

Mr. FRENCH. Well, that feature was not developed, other than it would naturally be developed by assuming it would be a rather large institution, located in the county in which it is and in a city that is made up of so large a colored population as Wilmington.

Mr. FOWLER. And is it intended to accommodate students outside of the town of Wilmington or the county in which the school is located?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I suggest it might be wise——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest it might be wise for the gentleman in whose district this city is to explain some of the questions that the gentleman on the committee is unable to answer. I do not know who is the Representative.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I represent that district. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—I have just come on the floor and did not hear his first remarks—I would be glad to hear in a brief statement what objection he has to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, the objection which I made was that there is no provision in here that the county will pay anything to the Government as a consideration for the transfer of the property. The original 50 acres cost $6,500, or at the rate of about $135 an acre, and here it is proposed to convey 34 acres without any consideration, except it should be used for certain purposes.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Is it not a fact that the bill proposes to convey it upon conditions?

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is what I have just stated.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. And those conditions are based upon the fact that the land shall be used for educational purposes. Now, if the transfer of this property is to be made solely upon the condition that it is to be used for educational purposes to establish an industrial school for the colored people, then what objection would the gentleman have? That is what I understand the bill does.

Mr. MANN. I did not know it was to be used for a colored industrial school. There is no statement to that effect in the bill or report.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I would like to ask the gentleman who has just catechized the gentleman from Illinois with reference to the saving clause, which reads as follows:

> The title thereof shall revert to the United States if at any time the land or any building erected thereon shall no longer be used for such a purpose.

Now, what does that mean?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I am perfectly willing for that to be part of the transfer.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The conveyance must necessarily use the language of the act.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Suppose the language of that act necessarily implies that there can be no abandonment until there has been an actual occupancy. Suppose they do not enter upon an occupancy of this ground, and suppose they do not erect a building, what becomes of the title, the conveyance having already been made?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. That could be cured by a clause to require them to enter upon the property upon conditions.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. That should be incorporated in this legislation.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I am perfectly willing for that to be done. I want to state further, Mr. Chairman, that this bill came from the Senate, and as I have been away from the Capitol for the past two weeks attending my primary I am not as familiar with it as I otherwise would have been. I am perfectly willing for this transfer to be made upon the condition that this property shall be used for educational purposes, because it is a matter of fact that the marine hospital there has more real estate, more acreage, than they find necessary to use, and it would be to the decided advantage of the colored people of the South and the people of that section of the country, as well as the city of Wilmington, to have this bill passed, and I am anxious to have the bill passed upon fair and equitable terms and provisions.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, as far as conditions are concerned I think the bill covers the question very well. The bill expressly provides that the conveyance shall be upon the condition that the land shall be used exclusively for industrial-school purposes.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And if it is no longer used for that purpose the title shall revert to the United States. Of course, we all know that as a matter of fact if at any time they conclude they want to use this for any other public purpose they would come to Congress and get the authority, and very likely properly so.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. That is not the desire. This bill is based solely upon the intention of using this property, the portion that the marine hospital does not need, for educational purposes.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina the question which I raised was whether the Government, where it purchases property for one purpose, perhaps it is for building a public building in a city, and concludes it wants to use some other site, the question is whether it shall then turn around and give away the site for educational or any other purposes without any compensation. I acknowledge, that in the light of what has been said about this being used for a colored industrial school, that it makes some difference in the situation; but may I ask the gentleman if he can give an approximate idea of the proportion of colored and white population in the county or city of Wilmington?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I am very sorry I have not the exact figures.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not need them.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. But I think it would be safe to say at least one-third of the population in Hanover County are colored people.

Mr. MANN. How much of a colored industrial school is there now?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. None whatever, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Idaho stated——

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I desire to say I was not before the committee; I was not in the city at the time, and requested before leaving here that Senator SIMMONS be allowed to represent me before the House committee, which he did.

Mr. MANN (continuing). That there was now an industrial school there.

Mr. FRENCH. I think a small industrial school that occupies about one or two blocks that is near this particular tract of land.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes, sir. I do not know as to that. I have no information.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the Chair for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] is recognized.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman who represents the district in which Wilmington is situated has not come upon the floor. I do not care to occupy the time of the committee further than to state to it that the purpose for which this land is to be used is to establish an industrial school for the education of the negro. The State of North Carolina has not been a frequent asker of the National Government for contributions of any sort, nor do I think any locality in it would be averse to the payment of a reasonable sum for anything it asks now. And this is no unusual proposition that is put to the Congress. I am sure in the brief service that I have had here that I have seen half a hundred bills passed donating land of the United States to municipalities and counties and States without a question being raised as to compensation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. PAGE. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that statement is correct if it should mean land which the Government had purchased? I am quite confident that the passage of those bills has been very infrequent, indeed.

Mr. PAGE. I agree with the statement of the gentleman that cases of land that has been purchased and a price been paid for it by the Government and that has been donated by it have not been frequent. I think there have been instances of this kind that might be cited. But I do not distinguish, as does the gentleman, between the land that the Government donates, whether it was purchased or whether it came into the hands of the Government in another way. It was the land of the Government and was as valuable, whether or not purchased for a given sum or whether it came into the hands of the Government originally in some other way. The State of North Carolina has certainly never had any land at the hands of the Government, being one of the original thirteen States, and there was no Government land in them and no donation of land to my State.

Mr. MANN. The State owned all the land?

Mr. PAGE. The State owned all the land, and therefore the Government could not give it any.

Mr. Chairman, I believe, in the light of all the facts that surround this particular case, this bill should pass. Although I do not want to make any plea here to the credit of the citizens or the taxpayers of the State of North Carolina or any other Southern State, it is only fair to say that for 50 years 95 per cent of the taxes of the State of North Carolina have been paid by the white people of the State; that they have taxed themselves and divided the school taxes in educating the negro, and they have had a burden that gentlemen on the other side of this aisle know nothing about. I do not think men ought to quibble about a few thousand dollars, even though it should be donated to a municipality in my State; and, of course, the tax money which is to support this school will be the money paid by the taxpayers of this county. I believe the National Government can well afford to make a donation of these few acres of land, for which it has no use now and which it can not use in all time to come. It is not of great value, because of its situation and character. I only want to say that, and ask that the bill pass.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I want to say just a word further. The land that we are seeking to transfer is not now necessary for the purpose of operating the marine hospital. It can be readily seen they now have more than they need with which to carry on that enterprise; and in view of that fact, and in view of the further fact that the land is lying idle and is rendering no service to the Government, the people of Wilmington, or the State of North Carolina, I am candid in my belief that this committee ought to pass the bill, because the proposition is made upon fair and reasonable terms. We come here and ask you to pass a bill and convey the land for educational purposes. We have done a great work in the State of North Carolina along the line of education, and we come and ask you to give us the privilege there to erect a great industrial school for the colored race; and we state further that we request that the lands be conveyed upon the condition that if we do not use them, or if we use them and abandon them at any time in the future, they may revert immediately to the Government. That seems to be a fair proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A while ago I tried to get some information from the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], the gentleman from North Carolina not being present. I wanted to know if there was any immediate prospect of the erection of a school or the extension of a school on these premises for educational purposes.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I am glad you asked me that question. While I was away from here the other day I was in the city of Wilmington, and had a talk with Mr. Carr, chairman of the board of education of New Hanover County, the county in which the city of Wilmington is situated, and he told me if this bill should pass they would begin the erection of this industrial school immediately; that the work would be undertaken and prosecuted this summer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. North Carolina is quite liberal in its treatment of the negro so far as education is concerned. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to know if the gentleman would agree to fix a limitation of time within which the improvement of this property for educational purposes is to begin?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I am perfectly willing to agree to that; but I do not think it is necessary, because I assure the gentlemen here that this work will begin speedily, and I feel it safe to say that it will begin this year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This property is located on the Cape Fear River, is it not?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes; on the Cape Fear River.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] a little while ago stated that there had been a number of gentlemen before the committee to discuss this matter and had stated incidentally that it was intended for educational purposes for the advancement of the negro?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is an intent on the part of the people of that county to improve these premises for the purpose of advancing the education of the negro?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Certainly; that is the sole intent. That will be done if this bill passes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman object to an amendment to the bill which would indicate that it is for the purpose of aiding the colored man?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I will not object to it, because I understand that is the purpose. I do not care for that, though, and we do not think that ought to go in.

Mr. MANN. "For industrial school purposes" is the language used in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In North Carolina they are comparatively liberal in their treatment of the negro. There is no question about that. But so long as the purpose to help the negro is not stated in the bill, I am satisfied with having it brought out in the discussion. I shall not insist on the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I do.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that he need not confine the liberality he refers to in regard to taxation and the erection of school buildings and the education of negro children to North Carolina. The same applies equally to any of the other Southern States.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. We admit that they are liberal in Georgia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to have the gentleman [Mr. BARTLETT] make that statement. I happen to know that in North Carolina they are doing the best they can under the circumstances.

Mr. BARTLETT. We are doing that also in Georgia, and we are taxing ourselves to a burdensome degree for that purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Georgia make the statement.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. With pleasure.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The State of Texas, I may say, appropriates the same amount of money to the colored race per capita for education as to the white children; that is, for the common schools.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. We do that also in North Carolina.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then we have the higher schools. We have a normal school in Texas upon which we expend quite a large sum of money annually. They have splendid buildings, and they have the same resources to draw from, and we pay the same amount of money to each individual negro as we do to our own people.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The schools for the negroes in Texas are separate from the schools for the white children, are they?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes. That is so throughout the South.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are your taxes separate for the two kinds of schools?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No; they are not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The general taxation applies equally to the education of the colored and the white children?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; it is the same general taxation, and the white people pay over 90 per cent, I may say 95 per cent, of the amount that is collected for the purpose of running all the schools of the State.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on this bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HILL. I would like to say a word. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill on its merits. I am in favor of anything that will tend to educate and uplift either the white or the black man who needs it in the South, but I am exceedingly tired of hearing men stand on this floor claiming to themselves great credit for paying taxes to educate illiterate people in the South. That is done all over the country. You are entitled to no more virtue and no more credit for doing it in North Carolina than we are in Connecticut, and if you would pay the same wages to these men and women in the South that we pay in the North they would pay their own taxes.

Bear that in mind. Your platform, issued yesterday, says:

We denounce the Republican pretense on that subject and assert that American wages are established by competitive conditions and not by the tariff.

And you in the South, beating down and having a lower rate of wages with child labor and longer hours than in any other part of the United States, are establishing competitive conditions by which the wages are kept down in the Northern States. So take no credit to yourselves that you are educating poor people in the South, because you are getting back a thousandfold the taxes that you pay in the lesser wages that you give to these poor people than we pay to like and corresponding and competing labor in the North.

I am in favor of your bill, but you should ask its passage on the merits of the case and not under any pretense, pharisaical or otherwise, that you are doing it as a matter of charity when you are getting your money back again many times in the lower wages you are paying to both blacks and whites. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] misinterpreted the intent of the provisions of this bill, and also misconstrued what was said on this side of the House by some of the gentlemen from the South. I think it can be safely stated here that the South has been as fair and as equitable and as true to the colored race as has any other section of the country.

Mr. HILL. I do not dispute it.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. While I do not care to inject a discussion of the race question or the salary or wages paid to the negroes in the South into the question of the passage of this bill, I want to say that the South pays the negro and the white man also an equitable wage for the services rendered every day in the year. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has done that in the past and will continue to do it in the future. But, Mr. Chairman, I can not see how that can come legitimately into the question of the passage of a bill to educate the negro and to establish this industrial school in the South to better his condition. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, if the discussion has been concluded I ask for a vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. EDWARDS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bill of the following title:

S. 4445. An act concerning unrigged vessels.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 21259. An act to allow an exchange of certain lands in the Harney National Forest; and

H. R. 24227. An act to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public building acts, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7163. An act authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions; and

S. J. Res. 121. Joint resolution authorizing the use of certain unexpended balances to defray expenses incident to parting and refining bullion.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment joint resolution of the following title in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. J. Res. 332. Joint resolution appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers for the Organized Militia.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 7163. An act authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

TO CONVEY TO WILMINGTON, N. C., PORTION OF MARINE-HOSPITAL RESERVATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply interested in the passage of this bill, for it deals with a question which is of vital importance to the American people. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey 34.1 acres of land, now owned by the United States, to the board of education of New Hanover County, in the State of North Carolina, for the purpose of establishing an industrial school for the education of colored people. It is a part of a 50-acre tract of land which the United States purchased in 1857 for marine-hospital purposes for the sum of $6,500. It is not now, and under all probability it will never, be used for marine-hospital purposes, as the remaining 15 acres are yet owned by the United States on which a marine hospital has been erected, and is regarded as being ample for all future use. The greater portion, if not all of the proposed transfer, lies in the city of Wilmington and lies adjacent to a small tract of land on which a colored school is located. If the proposed transfer of the 34.1 acres is consummated, it is the intention, I understand, to erect a commodious building and convert this school into an industrial college for the purpose of giving the colored boys and girls an opportunity for higher education, which, in my opinion, is most commendable.

Mr. Chairman, it is contended by some that this proposed grant of land for this industrial school is worth $22,500, and for this reason they claim that this bill should not pass, unless the county of New Hanover is willing to pay what the land is now worth, or at least pay what the Government originally paid for it. There might be some force to this contention if the Government stood in need of the land and could not part with it without being compelled to replace it by purchasing other lands, but no such conditions exist here. The Government can make no use of it, and probably will never have occasion to use it. It never has used it and for more than 50 years it has remained idle, yielding no benefit either to the public or to the private citizen. Under these conditions I see no reason why the donation should not be as complete and as generous as though the land came to the United States without cost. It is not a question of dollars and cents. It lies deeper than that. It goes down to the basis of our civilization and deals directly with the standard of citizenship of this Republic.

The perpetuity of our institutions depends upon the education of the many. It is said that a Republic can not endure half free and half slave; neither can it endure half educated and half illiterate. It will either resolve itself into a depotism, with the cultured as the rulers, or perish in anarchy and bloodshed at the hands of the ignorant. The colored people of this country number more than one-tenth of our population to-day, and it must be admitted that their opportunity for education is limited. Most of them are poor and depend solely upon their daily labor for the support of themselves and families. They do not have the advantage of educated ancestors to inspire them to greater efforts, and many of the children do not have the advantage of educated parents to aid and assist them in their studies. The beginning of their education dates back less than 50 years. Men are yet living who can remember when colored children were not sent to school at all. No preparation was then made on the part of the public for any kind of education for them and but few of them ever learned to read and write. Many old colored people are still living who learned to read and write after their children entered school. Thus handicapped by poverty and illiteracy, the colored people of to-day are struggling on to higher levels and to higher life. They need the assistance of the public to establish schools and libraries to aid them in their struggles, and I am of the opinion that we can make no better use of this tract of land than to donate it without cost and without price as the site of a great industrial colored school. Such an institution would be an ornament to the South. It would be an ornament to the Nation. It would be a blessing to the colored man. Then why not pass this bill?

Mr. Chairman, while it is true that in every part of this beautiful Republic, even in the South, I am informed, as well as in the North, there is great activity on the part of the governments of the different States to furnish the colored people with equal opportunities for education with that of the whites, yet it is a regrettable fact, Mr. Chairman, that by custom, and not by law, the colored man has not had that equal opportunity in any portion of this country. I am sorry to say that there still lingers in the bosom of a portion of the public at least, in the North as well as in the South, a feeling that the education of the colored people is only of secondary importance, thereby depriving him of the same opportunity for education that has heretofore been accorded to the white people. The environments of their ancestors, the limited amount of education of their parents, their poverty, and their lack of understanding of the value of knowledge has had a wonderful retarding influence over their ambition for education; but, as a whole, their advancement since their emancipation has been marvelous, and we wonder how it has been possible for them to rise in such a short time in many instances from dependence and poverty to independence, filling responsible positions of trust in official and professional and business life.

Confronted on all sides with prejudice and opposition to their advancement in education and society, they early betook themselves to their own quarters and their own color for counsel as to how they might best solve the problem of their own moral and intellectual advancement. They have established their own churches throughout the country and placed men of their own color in the pulpit, many of whom are now able ministers of the gospel and are wielding a wonderful influence in the moral uplift of their race. Inspired by the same influences, they demanded separate schools for their children and placed colored teachers over them. They have erected colleges in many places in the country, affording better opportunities for higher education for their children, among which is the Tuskegee Institute, conducted by Booker T. Washington. He is running this institution upon the theory that the colored man must work out his own salvation, and it is generally conceded that his school has done more for the advancement of the colored people, intellectually and morally, than any other institution in America. I understand that he is annually turning out well-educated boys and girls, with practical knowledge, thereby fitting them for teachers of colored schools and other responsible positions in business and professional life.

Mr. Chairman, I believe there is an instinct in all animal life, capable of working out its own destiny and filling the mission for which it was created. Acting upon this theory, I believe that the colored man is able to solve the problems of his own future, and if he elects to have industrial schools for the education of his children, separate and apart from the white schools, I see no good reason why he should not have them. In my district the colored people generally have separate schools, with teachers of their own color, and it is my opinion that they are making greater advancement than they would if they were taught in mixed schools by white teachers. I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, that there yet prevails an opinion all over this land, in the breasts of some at least, that the colored man is inferior and ought not to be educated equally with the whites.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The colored brother votes quite freely in the North.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand he does, and to the great astonishment of our institutions, some of them, like some of the whites, have the reputation of repeating on election day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a reflection on the colored brother that I did not make. The gentleman misunderstood the question.

Mr. FOWLER. I want the black man educated like I want the white man educated, so that both will rise above the business of repeating on election day, and help to maintain the purity of the ballot and preserve inviolate the institutions of our fathers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois is in favor of the free education of the negro?

Mr. FOWLER. I am.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman is in favor of free suffrage for the negro?

Mr. FOWLER. I am.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All over the country?

Mr. FOWLER. I am.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman is a patriot.

Mr. FOWLER. I stand for equal education for all the people. The best interest of this country demands it.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. I am afraid my colleague from Pennsylvania omitted a suggestion, that if the gentleman from Illinois is in favor of the free franchise of the negro his remarks ought to be addressed to the other side of the House instead of this side.

Mr. FOWLER. I am addressing my remarks to both sides of the House—as well to this side as to your side. If you were as much in favor of educating the colored man as you are the white man, there would not be one of you on that side of the aisle who would raise your voice against the passage of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, the true friend of the colored people is anxious to give them a fair and equal opportunity to prepare themselves for the discharge of the grave responsibilities which rest upon the citizens of this Republic, regardless of color or previous conditions of servitude. All others are their enemies. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the question of politics should be injected into this most important subject by the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. The question is too big for sectionalism or partisan politics. It appeals to our highest statesmanship with a warning that the life of this Republic depends upon the moral and intellectual education of the masses. This bill is the product of Members from the South. Many of its most ardent supporters come from the South. I am glad, indeed, Mr. Chairman, to see the South, as well as all other sections of this country, deeply concerned in the establishment of good schools for the education of the colored people, and for one I want to register my vote and my influence for the upbuilding and the education of the colored man the same as any other people of this country. Let us pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am very much delighted to be able to be present at the opening of the campaign of 1912, and from the deliverances which I have heard here during the last 20 minutes, I am sure it will be one of the most entertaining and delightful through which men of political experience have had the felicity of passing during the last half century. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I yield for a question.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman allude to the section of the Democratic platform that was read by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and to the political speech which he made a few minutes ago?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I did not pay any attention to the reading of the platform, but I did hear the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut in which he congratulated those who are behind this bill upon their progress as an evidence of the improvement throughout this country upon the part of men upon both sides of the aisle to do that which ultimately means the uplifting of both races in the country.

I claim not for this side of the House alone the selfish credit of having done all that has tended to bring about a better condition of the black man. I know there are patriots and wise and able and far-seeing men on the Democratic side of this House, just as there are upon the Republican side, and I know that there are men on that side of the aisle who in their hearts would go as far as many on this side to improve the conditions of the negro race in the United States. In my comment with reference to the opening of the campaign it was intended at first to be facetious, but if the gentleman seeks to give it an earnest color, then those on this side of the House are willing to pick up the glove where he threw down the gage.

There are in my district more colored boys and girls than there are in any other congressional district in the State of Pennsylvania, and that which you are doing or intending to do in the city of Wilmington we have been doing in the State of Pennsylvania for half a century. Our State appropriates more money for the education of its children than any other State in the family of this Union, and we make no discrimination between the black children and the white who walk the streets and the highways on their way to school in response to the music of the bell that sings from the tower on every school day. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman how many schools there are in the State of Pennsylvania for the colored children alone?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's question implies a discrimination which does not exist in the State of Pennsylvania. You will find in every section of the Keystone State schools in which the white boy and the black boy are being taught under the same roof.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire, then, further to ask what percentage of colored boys and girls graduate in the high schools of Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. And I will answer the gentleman by saying that the question of moral, political, or social right and wrong was never determined by a question of percentage.

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask the gentleman again if in the great universities of this country there is not a custom to discourage the admission of the colored boys and girls to the schools on an equality with the whites?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I can speak from my own experience as a graduate of one of the greatest universities of the North, the University of Michigan, and say that no such discrimination ever existed there in the past nor does it exist there to-day.

Mr. FOWLER. May I say that I have the honor to be a graduate of that great university, and in my class of more than 280 there were just two colored men who graduated.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean to say that there was any discrimination against those colored boys, or that they were deprived of a single right that he enjoyed while in that institution?

Mr. FOWLER. No; not by law, but by custom; and that is what I refer to when I say that the colored man has not had in America, either in the North or in the South, an equal opportunity for education.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman, during his time of being tutored in the University of Michigan, ever have occasion to raise his voice in protest against the treatment accorded to the two colored boys of whom he speaks?

Mr. FOWLER. I did not.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. That is a complete answer to my question and a vindication of my proposition that no such discrimination exists.

Mr. FOWLER. And then for that reason, because of that very custom, there is a necessity throughout the country to give to the colored men somewhere an opportunity to get a good education, and a separate school like the one proposed, which is of a character like that conducted by Booker T. Washington, who is doing more for the colored man to-day, to educate and uplift him, than all the people in the State of Pennsylvania. Such a school, in my opinion, offers an opportunity to the colored people for education superior to that afforded by the common schools.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, when the bill is read I desire to offer an amendment, and I will refer to that amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that if the general debate is closed the bill will be read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I was just about to give the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GODWIN] an opportunity to digest it while the bill is being read. I suggest as an amendment, to insert, after the word "purposes," on page 2, line 3, the words "that the board of education aforesaid shall within one year from the passage of this act enter and begin improvements upon the land and that," so as to place a limitation of one year within which they must enter and take possession of the land, and thus guarantee its use for school purposes at a reasonably early date.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, as I stated a while ago, that I have the assurance of the board of education of the county of New Hanover that they will make immediate entry.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman can have no objection to that amendment. The question arises in my mind whether we do not establish a bad precedent if we place no limitation whatsoever upon it, and if they are going to enter upon the land within a year there can be no objection, or the gentleman may make it two years if he wishes. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Well, I have the understanding that they will make immediate entry, but still we do not know what will intervene, and I suggest that the gentleman make it two years. Then I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 3, by inserting after the word "purposes" the following: "That the board of education aforesaid shall within two years from the passage of this act enter and begin improvements upon said land, and that."

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, after considering this I think that the amendment would jeopardize the bill in conference. It is a well-known fact that we are near the end of the present session, and I am anxious to get the bill passed at this session.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, while I do not think the amendment is at all necessary, as I understand the amendment it gives the county two years' time in which to commence the work.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not see how anyone can make any objection to that. I think the Senate will agree to that without any trouble.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. That is the only objection I have.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands commencing the thing is a very simple proposition, to haul one board on the land; you do not even need to dig a hole.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is apprehensive of the final consequences, I will withdraw the amendment, if I may, by unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I would very much appreciate it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are several gentlemen on this side who may oppose the bill if there is not some such stipulation as proposed by this amendment. Before the motion is put I should like to know whether some understanding could not be had as to some limitation as to time. I think some of the gentlemen on this side are apt to vote against the bill unless there is a limitation such as proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As far as that is concerned, how can you make it any stronger than it is in the bill when it says that the title shall revert to the United States if at any time the land shall no longer be used for such purposes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I am not expressing my own opinion now with regard to the bill itself, but I made the statement that several gentlemen intended to vote against the bill and had so expressed themselves, unless a limitation of time was introduced as proposed.

Mr. MANN. I think they were under the impression there was no limitation in here. This limitation in here requires the county to take this land at once and use it as soon as they get title to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the limitation is simply a guaranty of good faith upon the part of the county authorities. I question very much whether the bill would be held up. Some gentlemen have said that this bill establishes a precedent. It does in a way, because it takes from the Government a piece of property for which the Government has paid actual cash and gives it free to a county for purposes which were not clearly explained in the beginning of the discussion of the bill. We have since learned that it is intended that the county shall erect a school to educate colored children, a very worthy and commendable purpose, and for which I think most everyone upon this side of the House would vote, but the question of good faith is involved——

Mr. HOWARD. May I ask the gentleman why does he say "on this side"? Why does the gentleman put it that way?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Simply because objection to the bill seems to be raised largely on this side of the House.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very glad the gentleman explains it.

Mr. MANN. Because that side of the House is always willing to give away something for nothing.

Mr. HOWARD. Especially to help the colored people who need it so much.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment made a moment ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 3, by inserting, after the word "purposes," the following: "That the board of education aforesaid shall within two years from the passage of this act enter and begin improvements upon said land and that."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. I am entirely friendly to the purposes of this bill, and I desire to vote for it. I did not intend to discuss the political questions which have been raised in the opening of the campaign at the close of two great conventions. Those questions will be discussed in ample time, and when the people understand them fully the Republican Party will unquestionably win in a walk, as it deserves to do.

Mr. BURNETT. Which branch of it; there were two conventions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no division in the ranks of the Republican Party; we will vote as one man for the President.

Mr. CARLIN. Which man?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Who? Why the nominee of the Republican Party at Chicago——

Mr. CARLIN. Which convention?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Republican convention at Chicago.

Mr. CARLIN. Which Republican convention?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I believe that when the Republican Party comes together in November there will be but one song, and that the song of victory.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to discuss politics. They seem to have greatly troubled gentlemen upon the other side of the House during the past 10 days, and there is good reason for them now to take a rest. I wish I might discuss politics for a moment, however, because I would like to pay a tribute——

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is breaking in on a tribute. I was going to pay a tribute to one of your great Democrats. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to discuss politics for a moment to pay tribute to one of the great Democrats of this Nation, a man who I intended to applaud upon his entrance here this morning, and I am sorry I was a minute too late. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. We applauded two of them. Which one does the gentleman mean?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I want to say to those Democrats who have been attacking individuals on this side of the House and in the great Republican Party, and who have taken for truths those rumors and gossip which have been published with great frequency recently, that they now have an evidence of the tyranny of that so-called popular opinion, which, centered in the hands of one man, enabled him in the Baltimore convention to crush the presidential prospects of one whose 16 years of political life has been devoted faithfully to the service of the Democratic Party of this Nation. It is something for Democrats who have been assailing Republicans to think about; that after a life devoted honestly and courageously and with self-sacrifice to the cause in which he believed, the reputation and character of the Speaker of this House should at one fell swoop be assailed and taken away at the instance of another, who for the moment happened to have the ear of the newspapers and the applause of his followers.

But I am not going to discuss politics. I wanted to talk about education. I wanted to confirm what the gentleman said a moment ago in answer to my question in regard to the attitude of the State of North Carolina toward the education of the negro. I believe an honest effort is being made by the white people of North Carolina who do control that State politically to lead the negro onward and upward. I glorify the Southern State that undertakes this sort of work. All of the States below the old Mason and Dixon line have had difficulties to contend with, and they have struggled along bravely to do the best they could with conditions they knew better, perhaps, than the rest of us in other sections of the country. [Applause.] But since North Carolina now proposes to give the negro a chance to follow up this advance sentiment that prevails amongst the white people of the State, and to give the negro an opportunity, I am willing, for one, to vote over for educational purposes a piece of property the Government no longer needs. I shall support this bill and hope the amendment, which will show the good faith of the county authorities, shall be attached to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SMALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] opposed to the amendment?

Mr. SMALL. I am opposed to it and wish to address myself to the merits of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated a while ago what must be absolutely correct, that the United States is amply protected by the last clause of the bill on page 2. The language is as follows:

The title thereof to revert to the United States if at any time the land or any building erected thereon shall no longer be used for such purpose.

When the deed shall have been executed by the proper officials of the Government to this board of education that language will appear in the deed. It will be a condition subsequent which the authorities may at any time take advantage of by a proper suit and declare the deed void and restore the title to the Government. Of course, the Government will wait a reasonable length of time before instituting any such action, but as matter of law it would have the right to institute it at any time under this condition subsequent, which will be inserted in the deed.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE]?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Would it not solve the question if you struck out the words "no longer" and inserted the word "not"?

Mr. SMALL. Where?

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The words "no longer." The question is whether the words "no longer" imply a previous possession, and if you simply inserted the word "not" would it not cure the whole business?

Mr. SMALL. That would subject it to the same objection which was urged by my colleague, Mr. GODWIN, representing the district in which Wilmington is situated, and I submit that the words "no longer" are not ambiguous, and that they cover the purpose which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. I am reconciled to that view of it.

Mr. SMALL. The point I was submitting was, when this condition shall be inserted in the deed, the Government of the United States may at any time it chooses, in its discretion, if this property shall not be entered on and actually used for an industrial school as provided in the bill, institute a suit and have the title restored to the Government of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House favorably with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ADAMSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 6603) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the board of education of New Hanover County, N. C., portion of marine-hospital reservation not needed for marine-hospital purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was read a third time, and having been read a third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. 6369. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 6925. An act to authorize the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri;

S. 6847. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. J. Res. 111. Joint resolution to convey the thanks of Congress to Capt. ENCAMPMENT AND MANEUVERS OF ORGANIZED MILITIA.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up House joint resolution 332, appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers of the Organized Militia, and move to agree in a Senate amendment. It is a mere formal amendment adding the words "of America" after the words "United States" in the resolving clause. They were left out inadvertently.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. What is that?

Mr. DENT. A resolution providing for the joint maneuvers.

The SPEAKER. The Journal Clerk informs the Chair that this bill has no amendment to it.

Mr. DENT. I understand an amendment was made by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I think, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will wait a moment the engrossing clerk can give us some information on the subject. He has gone out to get it.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has had two days, and the Clerk will now proceed to read the call of committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania (when the Committee on Labor was called). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 22913) to create a department of labor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the fact that this bill is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Is the reading of the bill required before its consideration?

The SPEAKER. No. The House would resolve itself automatically into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, just a moment, before the House goes into Committee of the Whole. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. This bill, as I understand, has now been called up—the Department of Labor bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the bill has been called up, but the Chair has not announced that the House has gone into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought to have a quorum here to consider an important bill like this, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is none.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I demand a call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] moves a call of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, while I have no objection to a call of the House, or to the consideration of the bill, I want to say that this is the 3d of July and a great many Members on this side of the House are out of the city, and I suppose a great many on that side are absent also. As to-morrow is the Fourth of July, does the gentleman think it well to consider the bill to-day?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am very sorry that the minority leader [Mr. MANN] has raised the question of no quorum. I think that this is a matter that both sides of the House will probably favor. I do not speak of the details of it because, as the gentleman from Illinois knows, there have been party declarations, I think, on the part of both parties in favor of this proposition to create a department of labor with a member of the President's Cabinet at its head.

It was right for Congress to create the youngest Cabinet officer—that is, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor—and it was right for Congress to have created the office of Secretary of Agriculture, and no department has rendered more valuable service to the great agricultural interests of the country than our Department of Agriculture at Washington. The Department of Commerce and Labor has rendered great aid to our commerce, foreign and domestic, and I think that the multiplied interests of millions of our American citizens who are laborers demand that we create a separate department of labor and that such a department be represented by a Cabinet officer. Hence I heartily favor this bill and hope that it will pass now.

Mr. CANNON. A bill of this importance ought to be considered with a quorum present, so I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], my colleague, upon that point. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill. I am willing to consider it at any time, but——

Mr. CLAYTON. I am afraid that if we would take the suggestion of my friend from Illinois this bill would not, perhaps, get any consideration at this session, and it is very desirable that this bill be acted upon at the earliest possible day. I think we can get a quorum present to-day.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the gentleman's effort to get a quorum. It is a suggestion made in the most perfect good faith and not to embarrass the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Illinois always makes his suggestions in good faith and with great courtesy.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes from the committee with a unanimous report. A similar bill has been pending before that committee for years and there never has anyone appeared before that committee in opposition to the bill. There is a general demand for a department of this kind, and now that we have reached the point where the committee in charge of the bill can secure consideration before the House I insist upon proceeding with the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and Members, when their names are called, will answer "present."

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The roll call shows that 167 Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that there is no quorum present, and it is likely that no quorum is present in the city at this time, so soon after the adjournment of the convention and the fact that the Fourth of July follows immediately. So, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I should have supposed that there would be a quorum immediately after the Baltimore convention, for they would have no other place to go.

The SPEAKER. They are probably asleep. [Laughter.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania would withhold his motion to adjourn for a moment. I would like to inquire whether House joint resolution 332, with a Senate amendment, has come back to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that it would not make any difference whether it has or not, because the House can not take any action without a quorum.

Mr. DENT. I did not suppose that any Member would make any point in regard to it.

The SPEAKER. But the point of no quorum has already been made. The roll call has disclosed that no quorum is present and the Chair must take cognizance of the fact.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion of Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania was then agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with its previous order, adjourned until Friday, July 5, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of State submitting estimate of appropriation to eradicate the opium evil (H. Doc. No. 861); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of the Missouri River near Omaha, South Omaha, Florence, and Dundee (H. Doc. No. 862); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SAUNDERS: A bill (H. R. 25572) to amend the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. McGILLICUDDY: A bill (H. R. 25573) to provide for refund or abatement under certain conditions of penalty taxes imposed by section 38 of the act of August 5, 1909, known as the special excise corporation-tax law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STANLEY: A bill (H. R. 25574) to provide for the securing of plans for additional buildings for the Department of Agriculture in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 5, 1912.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

VANCOUVER MILITARY RESERVATION, WASH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad and for telephone, telegraph, and electric-transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, which were, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "the right" and insert "a revocable license"; on page 1, line 10, to strike out "grant" and insert "license"; and on page 1, line 11, to strike out "during the pleasure of Congress" and insert "at the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. DU PONT, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6603) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the Board of Education of New Hanover County, N. C., portion of the marine-hospital reservation not needed for marine-hospital purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 332) appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers for the Organized Militia.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 5623) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 6340) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 6384) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 6851) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 6978) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4445. An act concerning unrigged vessels.

H. R. 21259. An act to allow an exchange of certain lands in the Harney National Forest; and

H. R. 24227. An act to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public-building acts, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted by Local Union No. 21, United Garment Workers of America, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the passage of the so-called injunction limitation bill, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a petition of members of the Young People's Christian Union of Chanute, Kans., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES. I present telegrams in the nature of petitions from members of the Alaska Steamship Co., the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, and the Shipowners' Association of the Pacific Coast, favoring the adoption of a proposed amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was submitted by me on the 13th instant, to appropriate $115,000 to establish a light and fog signal at or near Cape St. Elias, Alaska. I move that the telegrams be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER presented petitions of Northern Light Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Monroe; of Weavers' Local Union No. 703, of Brunswick; and of sundry citizens of Portland, all in the State of Maine, praying for the establishment of a governmental system of postal express, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of St. Matthews, S. C., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of Local Union No. 534, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers of America, of Newport, R. I., praying for the passage of the so-called injunction limitation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA presented a memorial of Local Division No. 453, Order of Railway Conductors, of Enderlin, N. Dak., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called employers' liability and workmen's compensation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES presented resolutions adopted by Stevens Post, No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Washington, of Seattle, Wash., expressing confidence in the integrity and faithfulness of C. H. Hanford, United States district judge for the western district of Washington, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of the University of Washington, Seattle, Wash., and a petition of the faculty of the University of Washington (summer school), Seattle, Wash., praying for the establishment of a department of public health, which were ordered to lie on the table.

THE SPONGE INDUSTRY.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 6385) to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and Straits of Florida; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or disposing of the same; providing means of enforcement of same; and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 904) thereon.

EUGENE PRINCE.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Immigration I report back favorably, with an amendment striking out the preamble, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 220) to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts why it is necessary to pass the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I will be very glad to tell the Senator and tell the Senate. It is a very strange case. I never heard of one like it.

This young man's grandfather went to Russia as the representative of a large firm in Boston and established himself there. His son, John Henry Prince, was born there and remained an American citizen, but has resided in Russia ever since. He is the agent for the Niles Tool Works and the Bethlehem Steel Works. His son, the subject of the joint resolution, was born in Russia. Our statute, section 1993, provides that—

All children heretofore born or hereafter born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or may be at the time of their birth citizens thereof, are declared to be citizens of the United States; but the rights of citizenship shall not descend to children whose fathers never resided in the United States.

His father has never resided in the United States. Therefore he can not take by descent. He is not a Russian subject. He therefore can not be naturalized, for he has no allegiance to renounce. He could have become a Russian subject and then come here and renounced his allegiance, but he declined to swear allegiance to the Czar. He can not even get a passport to leave the country. It had to be arranged by our ambassador there with the knowledge of the Russian state department, and he was allowed to come out on a letter which they gave him.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. He is a man without a country now, of course.

Mr. LODGE. The House report, which I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD, says that Eugene Prince is a citizen of no country on earth. I may add that his family have been settled in the town of Wenham, Mass., since 1643. So he may fairly be described as American stock.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee recommend that the preamble shall be stricken out. It will be so ordered, without objection.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the House report may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House Report No. 856, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, submitted the following report, to accompany House joint resolution 220:

The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 220) to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince, reports the same without amendment and recommends that it be passed.

Eugene Prince is a citizen of no country on earth. His father is an American citizen residing in Russia; but under section 1993, Revised Statutes of the United States, American citizenship has not descended to Eugene Prince. On the other hand, as will be seen from the subjoined letters of the State Department and of the American ambassador at St. Petersburg, under Russian law Eugene Prince is not a Russian subject.

Prince is at present employed in Chicago, Ill., by the International Harvester Co. He is 22 years of age. It is impossible for him satisfactorily to meet the legal requirements of naturalization in the United States, as he has no allegiance to renounce.

The young man's history is as follows:

He comes of a family who settled in Essex County, Mass., in 1643. His relatives are residents of Wenham, Salem, Andover, and Cambridge, Mass.

As a young man his grandfather, George Henry Prince, left Salem, Mass., and went to St. Petersburg, Russia, to represent the firm of Messrs. W. Ropes & Co., of Boston, Mass., exporters of petroleum. Subsequently he became a partner of the firm, dying in Finland in 1900. George H. Prince's fifth child, John Henry Prince (father of Eugene Prince), was born in Russia and never resided in the United States, retaining, however, his American citizenship and acting as agent for various American firms, such as the Niles Tool Works, of Hamilton, Ohio, the Bethlehem Steel Works, etc. John Henry Prince is now about 49 years old. He is carried on the Russian records as an American citizen doing business in St. Petersburg under an annual permit of residence known as a "billet de sejour." Under the Russian law his offspring are also held to be American citizens.

Eugene Prince, the beneficiary under H. J. Res. 220, son of John Henry Prince, was born January 22, 1890. On completing his studies he became a clerk in the office of the International Harvester Co. at Moscow, Russia. As he approached the age of 21 years he determined to return to America and take up his residence, but soon found that there was difficulty about his citizenship and consequently about his passport for leaving Russia.

Under section 1993, Revised Statutes of the United States, American citizenship does not descend to the children of an American citizen who has never resided in the United States. Consequently, as John Henry Prince has never resided in this country, our diplomatic and consular officers in Russia could not recognize his son, Eugene Prince, as an American citizen and therefore could issue him no passport.

On the other hand, Russian law does not recognize Eugene Prince as a subject of the Czar, and therefore he could not get a passport as a Russian.

It appears that when an American resident in Russia desires to leave that country he must arm himself with a permit from the Russian Government allowing him to pass the border. This permit is only issued upon the presentation of his American passport. As Eugene Prince could present no American passport he could get no Russian permit to cross the border. Ambassador Rockhill and various consular officers interested themselves in the matter and affairs were finally adjusted temporarily through the good offices of Ambassador Guild. The Russian Government issued to Eugene Prince a special permit in the form of a letter, and then by the American consul he was passed over the border and put on the steamship at Libau, Russia.

Some time in 1911 Prince arrived in this country. After a visit to his relatives in Wenham, Mass., he entered the Chicago offices of the International Harvester Co., and at the same time made declaration of his intention to become an American citizen, should it prove impossible to obtain special legislation in his behalf. It now appears that this declaration does not and can not conform with the terms of the law. Unless this resolution is passed, Prince will be in a deplorable situation, without standing as a citizen of any country and without the possibility of returning to Russia because he can secure no passport either as an American citizen or as a subject of the Czar. And yet his chief value to his employers obviously arises from the fact that his knowledge of the Russian tongue and of Russian business methods makes him a most acceptable agent to send to Russia from time to time to straighten out difficulties and to help in the introduction of new lines of goods. Unless his way is open for free entrance into Russia and free exit from Russia his services to his employers will be of little or no value. He must probably content himself with a very inferior situation.

It is true that Eugene Prince could to some extent have solved the difficulty before leaving Russia had he been willing to take the necessary steps to obtain Russian citizenship. The opportunity was open to him under Russian law to swear allegiance to the Czar, to have himself received into a "class" so called, to pay certain fees and conform to some formalities. In this way he could have become a Russian subject and could have obtained a passport as such whenever he should desire to revisit Russia. Naturally enough, however, he had no desire to swear allegiance to the Czar, and then proceed at once to the United States for the purpose of renouncing that very allegiance. His convenience would have best been served by adopting Russian citizenship. He has passed the age for military service and no embarrassing obligations would have fallen to his lot. Nevertheless, it was and is repugnant to his sentiments to abandon his desire to be recognized as a citizen of the United States in view of his descent and in view of his training and sympathies and in view of the fact that until recently he always supposed that his American citizenship was an unquestioned fact.

MARCH 12, 1912.

Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT,
House of Representatives.

SIR: With reference to your letters of February 10 and 17, 1912, concerning House joint resolution 220, providing for the citizenship of Eugene Prince, who was born in Russia of an American father who had never resided in this country, you are informed that this case has been informally and unofficially referred to a member of the Russian embassy, who confirms the conclusion already reached by the department that Mr. Prince did not acquire Russian nationality by the fact of his birth within the territory of Russia, the Russian law of nationality being based upon the jus sanguinis and not upon the jus soli. While it is believed that this information can be relied upon for the purpose you have in view, yet, if you so desire, the department will seek to obtain from the appropriate Russian authorities an official statement of the law applicable in this case. I venture the suggestion, however, that to obtain such a statement would not improbably require considerable time.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
HUNTINGTON WILSON,
Acting Secretary of State.

ST. PETERSBURG, May 3, 1912.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington.

SIR: Referring to the department's unnumbered instructions of April 13 last, relative to the citizenship of Eugene Prince, I have the honor to report that under Russian law Mr. Prince can not be considered a Russian subject.

In determining the nationality of a native Russian in foreign lands the Russian law only considers the question of whether such individual obtained permission from his Government to renounce his allegiance thereto and to assume a foreign citizenship, or, if born in a foreign country, whether his parents were Russian subjects. Under this theory the Russian law applies the same test to foreigners who may be born or who reside in Russia.

Thus Mr. Prince, whose grandfather and father were Americans, is also considered an American, even though born in Russia. He had the opportunity of becoming a Russian subject at any time after five years' continuous residence, but did not do so.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
CURTIS GUILD.

[Section 1993, Revised Statutes of the United States.]

All children heretofore born or hereafter born out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or may be at the time of their birth citizens thereof, are declared to be citizens of the United States; but the rights of citizenship shall not descend to children whose fathers never resided in the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SANDERS:

A bill (S. 7252) to amend section 107 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911 (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BURTON:

A bill (S. 7253) granting an increase of pension to Lucy E. Richards; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROOT:

A bill (S. 7254) for the relief of Nicholas Redmond and certain other Army officers and their heirs and legal representatives; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GARDNER:

A bill (S. 7255) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James L. Pierce (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 7256) granting a pension to Mary J. D. Arkett (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 7257) granting an increase of pension to Jennie E. Engle (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7258) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Staton, including Earnest M. Staton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

A bill (S. 7261) granting an increase of pension to William L. Brown (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL (H. R. 25069).

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the establishment in Alaska of a fisheries experiment station, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $35,000 for the improvement of the Government road in the Mount Rainier National Park, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CATRON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, to lie on the table.

Mr. CRANE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, to lie on the table.

IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION (S. DOC. NO. 869).

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have here a paper on irrigation and reclamation by Francis G. Tracy, of New Mexico. It is a very interesting and instructive presentation of the question, containing valuable information in the way of statistics relating to the Reclamation Service and various other things. I should like to have it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the paper which he has described be printed as a public document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

On July 1, 1912:

S. 3203. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands within the Umatilla Indian Reservation to the city of Pendleton, Oreg.

On July 3, 1912:

S. J. Res. 69. Joint resolution authorizing the licensing and employment of Otto Neumann Sverdrup as master of vessels of the United States;

S. 547. An act for the relief of Sarah A. Waite;

S. 1337. An act authorizing the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Lloyd L. R. Krebs, late a captain in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, a major in the Medical Corps on the retired list and increasing the retired list by one for the purposes of this act;

S. 7018. An act to authorize the appointment of Harold Hancock Taintor to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army;

S. 2601. An act for the relief of Douglas B. Thompson;

S. 5046. An act to authorize the appointment of Shepler Ward FitzGerald and of Alden George Strong to the grade of second lieutenant in the Army;

S. 2127. An act for the relief of the heirs of Robert S. Gill; and

S. 6009. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Huron, S. Dak.

On July 3, 1912:

S. J. Res. 94. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution in the class other than Members of Congress;

S. 462. An act for the relief of Slavo Ramadanovitch, of Cetigne, a Montenegrin subject, heir and administrator of Marcus Ramadanovitch, alias Radich, deceased;

S. 837. An act to reimburse the officers and crew of the lighthouse tender Manzanita for personal-property losses sustained by them on the foundering of that tender October 6, 1905;

S. 2427. An act for the relief of the legal heirs of A. G. Strain;

S. 3469. An act for the relief of the American Surety Co. of New York; and

S. 4751. An act for the relief of Albert S. Henderer.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the unfinished business is taken up, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bridge bill that will take only a moment. It is the bill (S. 7195) to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Great Northern Railway Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the needs of navigation, to be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War, either in the county of McKenzie or Williams, in the State of North Dakota, or the county of Dawson or Valley, in the State of Montana, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly hereby reserved.

Mr. HEYBURN. The title does not state under the laws of what State the corporation was organized. It is in the body of the bill. I ask that that be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read that part of the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

A corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN IDAHO.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 24565, the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from California yield to me for a moment. I merely want to have taken from the calendar and passed a bill affecting school lands in my State.

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20684) providing for the sale of the Lemhi School and Agency plant and lands on the former Lemhi Reservation, in the State of Idaho.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator from California will yield to me I wish to make a motion which will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho has asked unanimous consent to call up a bill from the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a matter that should involve no discussion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. After that is disposed of I will ask for recognition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asked the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20684) providing for the sale of the Lemhi School and Agency plant and lands on the former Lemhi Reservation in the State of Idaho.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield as soon as the naval appropriation bill is laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill 24565, being the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MYERS. What bill is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MYERS. Has the morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not sure that the announcement was made, but it has in fact been concluded. The Chair will now say that, unless the Senator has morning business——

Mr. MYERS. I wanted to make a motion before the morning business was closed. I ask the Senator from California if he will withhold his motion, so that I may make a motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not made the announcement, and therefore the Senator may submit the matter.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on Wednesday of this week, during my necessary and unavoidable absence, the Senate took up and passed to a third reading, and finally passed, House bill 20728, being the Indian appropriation bill. There were considered during the proceedings several amendments that mean very much to the people of Montana. Some of those amendments were passed upon adversely. There was no one on the floor of the Senate to speak for Montana, to speak for those most interested. I regret very much that it was absolutely impossible for me to be here, and I know that the action of the Senate in taking up the bill and passing adversely on matters of great importance to the people of Montana was unintentionally and inadvertently taken in my absence. Of course, I know that no one would think of doing it intentionally. I understand the excitement and rush of affairs that have been on in the Senate for some days past and the irregularity of proceedings; but, while it may or may not do any good, I should like very much for the people of Montana to be allowed, at least, to be heard, to have a word spoken in their behalf in those matters before they are finally passed upon. I am satisfied that the Senate will agree thereto. In fact, I have been so assured by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who is in charge of the bill.

I move that the vote by which House bill 20728 was passed be reconsidered. My object in making that motion is simply that there may be a review of the action of the Senate on two or three amendments, and then the Senate may do what it may see fit after I have made a statement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have never before heard of reconsidering the vote by which an appropriation bill was passed and bringing it back to the Senate because Senators for any reason were unable to be present and take part in discussing amendments. It seems to me, if we enter on the recalling of appropriation bills so as to discuss amendments which have been voted down or voted in, there will be absolutely no end, no finality, to the business of the Senate. I hope such a motion will not be adopted.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, since I have been a Member of this body, which is now 16 months, I have been absent but 5 days during its sessions—3 days this week, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, on account of the Democratic national convention at Baltimore; 1 day this session previous thereto, upon which I was in attendance at the funeral of a relative near here; and 1 day during the special session last summer, during which I was confined to my bed by illness. Five days have I been absent from the sessions of this body—1 day by illness, 1 by reason of a funeral, 2 days by reason of being a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Baltimore, and 1 day only, Wednesday of this week, on account of pressing private business and family matters, which rendered my absence absolutely unavoidable.

I was much surprised yesterday to learn that the Senate had taken up the Indian appropriation bill, when neither Senator from Montana was on the floor to be heard and when that bill involved amendments amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars of appropriations for reclamation work upon Indian reservations in Montana, and this, too, when, as I have said, there was not a voice to be heard here on behalf of the people of Montana. I did not learn anything about it until yesterday; I had no means of knowing that that bill was to be taken up on Wednesday—the one day out of my 16 months of service here when I was necessarily and unavoidably absent on account of private business and family matters. This bill was not on any calendar. I had received no notice that it was to be taken up. The unfinished business of the Senate was the chemical tariff bill. I was paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] and supposed that that pair would protect me on all matters that might come before the Senate.

I arrived here from Baltimore about 5 o'clock Wednesday afternoon. I could not possibly be ready to leave Baltimore until 12.30 o'clock. I then found that the next train did not leave until 2.43 o'clock; but that train was late in arriving at the depot in Baltimore, and it was further delayed on the way, so that it was about 5 o'clock when I arrived here. I went to my office, knowing, as I have stated, that I had a pair with the Senator from Connecticut and supposing that I would be protected on all matters coming before the Senate; but I found awaiting me 10 days' accumulated mail, which I started to look into. I had not finished looking over my mail until the sound of the electric bell notified me that the Senate had adjourned for the day. I repeat I had no way of knowing that that bill would come up that day.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the notice of the acting chairman of the committee of his intention to call up that bill was on the front page of the calendar for days and days.

Mr. MYERS. Well, I had not seen it, and my secretary informed me it was not there.

Mr. LODGE. That is really not the fault of the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. No; I will admit that. If such notice was on the calendar I was not aware of it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the RECORD will show distinctly that on Monday last, while we were discussing the Indian appropriation bill, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] asked that the consideration of the portion of the bill relative to Montana be deferred until the return of the Senator from Montana, and it was the understanding that those items were to be passed over.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I doubt whether that is an exact statement of the situation. Of course, I knew that many Senators were away on Monday and Tuesday last. I think the suggestion was made that, in view of the absence of the Senator from Montana, the items in reference to his State be passed over at that time. I supposed that on Wednesday morning all Senators were in Washington, though not necessarily in the Chamber until they might find it to their convenience to be here. At the same time, so far as I am personally concerned, rather than have any misunderstanding of the slightest nature as to the naval appropriation bill—I would not want to interrupt the consideration of that bill at this time—after the passage of that bill, while it is an unusual proceeding and a most undesirable precedent to establish, if the Senate feels so inclined, I certainly, for one, would have no objection to again bringing the Indian bill before the Senate for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Montana to urge the amendments to which he refers.

Mr. LODGE. I simply want to call attention to the fact that on June 27, 1912, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] gave notice that on Monday, July 1, following the routine morning business, he would ask the Senate to take up and consider the Indian appropriation bill. That notice remained on the calendar until the bill was disposed of. It never went off the calendar; it was there every day.

Now, Mr. President, one word. I appreciate the Senator's close attendance here; I appreciate the importance of the amendments to which he refers; but if we are to have appropriation bills reconsidered and brought back here, the necessary business of the Congress will never be done. Here we are trying to get through the work of the session in some reasonable time in this hot weather, and if we bring that bill back and reconsider the vote by which it was passed, we shall reopen the whole bill. It seems to me that there will be no end to it if we begin to reconsider and bring back appropriation bills.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can we not get unanimous consent to take up nothing else but the items referred to by the Senator from Montana? With that understanding, I think the Senator will agree to let the bill come up.

Mr. MYERS. There are only three amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Is every Senator to have the same privilege?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; not at all. This is an exceptional case.

Mr. LODGE. If for any reason a Senator is not here when an appropriation bill passes, is he to have the right to have it brought back?

Mr. OVERMAN. The items to which the Senator from Montana refers will not take half an hour.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I am speaking of the principle. If we make the concession to one Senator, every other Senator will have a right to make the same request when by any misfortune or by any necessity he is absent from the Senate and finds that some amendment has passed or failed to pass in which he is interested. He will have a right to have a great appropriation bill brought back and reconsidered when perhaps we are on the eve of adjournment in a short session on the 4th of March.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if there was any item affecting Montana in the Indian appropriation bill as it passed the House that was stricken from the bill by the Senate?

Mr. MYERS. I believe not, Mr. President. The amendments that were defeated were amendments proposed by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, which increased some appropriations over the amounts the House had allowed.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator, then, were any of the increases that were recommended estimated for by the department?

Mr. MYERS. My understanding is that they were recommended by the Reclamation Service. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] if there was not some recommendation along that line?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the acting chairman of the committee, who has the bill in charge, was there an item affecting Montana in the Indian appropriation bill as it passed the House that was stricken out in the Senate?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I will answer that question and perhaps avoid further questions by going a little further than merely making the answer the question would require.

There were two unimportant provisions of the Indian appropriation bill as it passed the House about which the Senator from Montana, as I understand, makes no contention. Then there were certain increases which the Senate committee proposed, some to the extent of the estimates and some in excess of the estimates. The particular item which was recommended by the Reclamation Service was allowed to stand. The increases which the Senate committee recommended were cut down in the Senate to the amounts estimated for.

Mr. SMOOT. So that the bill provides for all the amounts that were estimated for?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; all that the estimates covered.

Mr. LODGE. Then it would be perfectly useless to go back, because a point of order would take them all out.

Mr. CLAPP. There was one item, which appears on page 33, that was objected to on a point of order, and the point of order was sustained.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, the Senator from Montana could not have it adopted if the bill was reconsidered, because the same point of order would be made against it. The amounts estimated for are in the bill, and a point of order would lie against an amendment increasing the amount, so that it would be useless to bring the bill back to the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I am not seeking to bring up anything against which a point of order was made.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator is not, but the Senator is seeking to bring the bill back into the Senate for the purpose of increasing certain appropriations, and those increases are increases over the amounts estimated for by the department.

Mr. MYERS. Well, is that new business?

Mr. SMOOT. The increases would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. The increases not being estimated for, would go out on a point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; they are not estimated for and would go out on a point of order.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor, but I will yield to any Senator who wishes to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me the request submitted by the Senator from Montana ought certainly to be acceded to by the Senate. His only request is that we may reconsider the Indian appropriation bill to give him an opportunity to present, for the consideration of the Senate, certain amendments very material to the well-being of Montana. He has explained to the Senate very clearly how he was misled and the reason for his absence. It seems to me we can conduct the business here more rapidly and more satisfactorily if the request of the Senator from Montana, which is a reasonable one, is granted.

The bill has not left the Senate; a motion for the reconsideration of the entire bill is in order; the acting chairman of the committee says he is willing that a motion to reconsider be agreed to; but the Senator from Montana does not ask that; he simply asks that the bill be reconsidered by unanimous consent to the extent of permitting him to offer three amendments very important to his State. Whether they will pass or not pass, he is entitled to the privilege of having them presented for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. And entitled to the privilege of having a point of order made against them.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the Senator from Montana says that he will offer no amendment that will be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. If the amendments propose amounts beyond the estimates the Senator from Virginia knows as well as I do that they are subject to a point of order.

Mr. SWANSON. Increases?

Mr. LODGE. If they are beyond the estimates they are subject to a point of order.

Mr. SWANSON. Beyond the estimates?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; of course they are.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if Senators will pardon me a moment, I wish to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. My impression is that, if the Senator will go through the various items in the Indian appropriation bill, he will find that, with the exception of the item against which the point of order was made, the items were adopted. So his motion might rest for the present and we can go on with the naval appropriation bill. The Senator can then go over the items, and possibly he will be satisfied with them as they have been disposed of, if not, he can bring in a concrete suggestion as to the particular matters he desires to bring up.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to what the RECORD shows about this matter:

> Mr. CURTIS. In view of the fact that the Montana Senators are absent, I suggest that we pass over the Montana amendments and take them all up at one time. I understand there are other amendments in the bill to be passed over, and I presume there will be no objection to this course.
> Mr. CLAPP. There is no objection to it.
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendments under the heading "Montana" will be passed over for the present.

So that on account of the absence of the Montana Senators the matter went over. All the Senator from Montana now asks is to have the privilege of bringing certain amendments up for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. That was on Monday, was it not, Senator?

Mr. SWANSON. Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. If the view reached by the Senator was carried to its logical conclusion when the bill came up in the Senate on Wednesday and was ready for passage, it should have been laid aside until the Senator arrived.

Mr. SWANSON. It was impossible for the Senator to arrive in time. This was an unusual occurrence. A Democratic convention meets only once in four years. It does not meet every week. Consequently the exigency was unusual.

Mr. SMOOT. It does seem to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota is a sensible one. Let the Senator from Montana take each of the items and see whether a point of order will lie against them. If it will, there is no need of bringing the bill back to the Senate. If it will not, then we can take up the question for further consideration.

Mr. MYERS. I will say, in reply to some of the suggestions that have been made, that these increases were recommended by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and, according to my understanding, that eliminates them from the schedule of new business and makes them in order.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the rule. If they fall within the rule of not being estimated for, they will go out on a point of order. I have no doubt the rule of this body is such that a point of order would lie against the amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the committee recommends them they can be considered.

Mr. SMOOT. That is only a recommendation. That does not put them in a position where a point of order will not lie against them.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, this is the next legislative day, a day within which the motion to reconsider can be made and save the point. It holds the bill here now. In the meantime we can go into these matters.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I understand that thoroughly. I want to say a few words further if I may, without interruption, in reply to some things which have been said.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] called my attention to the fact that on the 27th of last month the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the acting chairman of the committee, gave notice that he would move last Monday to call up the bill. I was not here on the 27th day of June, and I have not seen the calendar since then until yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Minnesota gave notice on May 31 that he would call up the act making appropriations for Indian affairs at the earliest possible moment, and that notice was carried on the face of the calendar for one month.

Mr. MYERS. I did not know what the earliest possible moment would be. I am not endowed with divine foreknowledge of these things. I could not have foreseen that the bill would be called up day before yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Minnesota gave notice that he intended to call it up immediately after the routine morning business at the very first opportunity, and he gave that notice a month ago.

Mr. MYERS. I did not know when the first opportunity would be. The Senator from Massachusetts may have; I did not.

Mr. LODGE. It served to put the Senator on notice, inasmuch as the notice appeared on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. I presume I was supposed to remain here every second of the time from the 31st of May to the very hour when the bill was called up, in order to keep business that affects the people of the State of Montana from being railroaded to an adverse decision in my absence one day out of the 16 months I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it seems to me that what the Senator from Montana asks is something that is merely fair. We entered into a sort of gentleman's agreement that no important business should be taken up between certain dates. At the time we entered into that agreement we thought that those dates would cover the two great national conventions. As a matter of fact, the agreement did cover the Republican convention, and protected every Republican Senator—every one. The spirit of the agreement was for mutual protection. The agreement was that no important legislative matter should be taken up.

But, as a matter of fact, the Democratic national convention lasted not only longer than anybody expected, but I believe longer than any other one ever did.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I want that agreement carried out in spirit as much as the Senator does. I want it to cover both conventions. As it covered the Republican, I want it to cover the Democratic convention; and if this had happened on Monday or Tuesday I should not have said one word, but it happened on Wednesday, after the conclusion of the Democratic convention, and Baltimore is within a comparatively short distance of Washington.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not know that. I thought the matter had been brought up on Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator also to the fact that we were so careful that the spirit of the agreement should be carried out that even the unanimous-consent agreement that was made for Tuesday failed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said what I did then under a misapprehension of the facts. I thought it occurred while the Baltimore convention was in session.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think the Baltimore convention did not adjourn until 2 o'clock Wednesday morning. Therefore a Senator can not be said to have been derelict in not being here when the bill came up on Wednesday, he being detained in the convention hall until 2 o'clock in the morning of Wednesday. But, independently of that, it seems to me that Senators are antagonizing a reasonable motion. There seems to be an indisposition to allow a fair hearing in respect to a matter which very much concerns a Senator who was unavoidably absent on that occasion.

Mr. LODGE. I thought it had been arranged, on the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, that he go over the question with the Senator from Montana, and if the point of order would not lie, the matter would be taken up. The motion to reconsider has been entered.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If that is agreeable to the Senator from Montana, I shall have nothing more to say.

Mr. MYERS. It is.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words on this subject. I suppose I have been guilty of consuming an entirely undue proportion of the time of this body, to the exclusion of those Members who have practically nothing to say, but I will trespass a little further.

I have been here for 16 months. I have time and again heard the request made on the floor of the Senate that certain business be allowed to go over because a State that had an interest in such legislation was not represented on the floor or because a Senator who was interested in it was not present on the floor. I have never objected to any of those requests. I have favored all of them. I have myself made request that legislation go over because a Senator who was interested in it was not present. I am astounded, I am amazed, that this bill was put through on Wednesday, and that amendments involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, in which the people of Montana are interested, were decided adversely in the absence of both Senators from Montana. I repeat emphatically I am amazed that it was done.

I would have thought that there would have been some one Senator, be he Democrat or Republican, on this floor who would have arisen and called attention to the fact that Montana was not represented on the floor of the Senate and asked that that part of the bill be allowed to go over. I have made those requests myself, and I have seen it done time and again, and I have never objected to it, and it seems to me that it might have been done for me and my colleague on Wednesday; but it was not.

These amendments in which I am interested were not offered by me; they were offered by my colleague; but, nevertheless, I am no less interested in them; and I consider it as much my duty to say what the people of Montana wish said about them as if they were my own amendments and I had offered them. I feel just as much interested in them as if they were my own amendments; I feel there is just as much merit in them as if they were my own amendments; and even if the Senators from Montana are not entitled to sufficient consideration to be allowed to be present when matters of this kind are considered, I think the State of Montana and the people of the State of Montana are entitled to that much consideration.

Now, Mr. President, having made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed the Senate, and understanding that the bill is retained in the possession of and under the jurisdiction of the Senate, and that my motion will protect any rights I may have or interests I may desire to further in the bill, and not desiring to be in the way of anything else, and understanding that the Senate wishes to take up the naval appropriation bill, I will let the motion lie over until after the naval bill is disposed of, and then I will call it up.

I will say further, while I have the floor, that I gave notice some time ago that to-day I would submit to the Senate some remarks on the right of Mr. LORIMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, to a seat in this body. I have not been able to give the matter the exhaustive attention and investigation I had desired or to make the analysis I had desired of the law and the facts in the case, and would have to confine myself to a few extemporaneous remarks; but, understanding that it is the desire to get the naval bill under consideration to-day and finish it if possible, I will waive my right to speak on the Lorimer case to-day and will let it go over until to-morrow, and will endeavor to get an opportunity to make what remarks I may see fit in the general discussion, which will begin to-morrow and continue until that matter is disposed of.

STANDARD GRADES FOR APPLES.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask that the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21480, and that is be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21480) to establish a standard barrel and standard grades for apples when packed in barrels, and for other purposes, and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the Senate proceed with the naval appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. On page 4 the clerk very naturally said "strike out lines 4 to 10 and insert." There is nothing to be inserted. Those are two entirely distinct amendments. To strike out lines 4 to 10 is one amendment, and the clause in italics is another amendment. They have no relation to each other and should be disposed of separately. I think we can do that now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment striking out lines 4 to 10.

Mr. LODGE. That is the pending question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Now comes the new amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 4, after line 10, to insert:

That hereafter commissioned officers of the staff corps of the Navy who are graduates of the Naval Academy below the rank of captain shall be promoted in rank with the officer of the line with whom or next after whom they take precedence on the list of order of precedence of the Navy, and to carry out this provision temporary changes shall be made, when necessary, in the numbers of the various grades and ranks established by law for the staff corps: Provided, That there shall be no other promotion in grade or rank in any staff corps except in accordance with this act and all laws and acts in conflict with this provision are hereby repealed: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held to increase the total number of officers in any staff corps as now fixed by existing laws and provided for in this act.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire, on the part of the committee, to correct the amendment by striking out the words "who are graduates of the Naval Academy."

The SECRETARY. On page 4, in the committee amendment, line 12, strike out the words "who are graduates of the Naval Academy," so that if amended it will read:

That hereafter commissioned officers of the staff corps of the Navy below the rank of captain shall be promoted, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to say that I, and I think the Senator from Minnesota and perhaps one or two other members of the committee, agreed to this amendment with that limitation. It is clearly open to a point of order, and with that limitation stricken out I make the point of order on the clause.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts understand that the amendment has been agreed to striking out the words?

Mr. LODGE. I do. I did not desire to oppose the amendment, but if there is to be no limitation on this great increase of pay and rank, I desire to make a point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to it.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order, and I suppose that is all there is before the Senate, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question before the Senate. The amendment has not yet been reported to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It was read the other afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it has been, and the Chair is now informed that a point of order was made against it by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. So the pending question is on the point of order.

Unless something is to be suggested to the contrary, the Chair sustains the point of order.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 18, to insert:

Hereafter any naval officer on the retired list may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be ordered to such duty as he may be able to perform at sea or on shore, and while so employed in time of peace shall receive the pay and allowances of an officer of the active list of the grade from which he was retired: Provided, That no such retired officer so employed on active duty shall receive, in time of peace, any greater pay and allowances than the pay and allowances which are now or may hereafter be provided by law for a lieutenant commander on the active list of like length of service: And provided further, That any such officer whose retired pay exceeds the highest pay and allowances of the grade of lieutenant commander, shall, while so employed in time of peace, receive his retired pay only, in lieu of all other pay and allowances.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that under this amendment, on page 6, lines 22 and 23, a retired officer when put on active duty gets the pay and allowances of the grade at which he is retired. Now, that is unfair for this reason: In many instances just before they are retired they are given an extra grade, and they are given this pay on the extra grade which was given to them just as they were retired.

Mr. LODGE. The proviso, if the Senator will allow me, cuts it down.

Mr. NELSON. It does cut it down in some cases, but not in all cases.

Mr. LODGE. It cuts it down to the rank of lieutenant commander, and there are very few retired officers below that rank. This is to stop the employment of retired officers. That is the point of the amendment. It leaves the grade of lieutenant commander as the only retired pay. They now get full pay if they are put on active duty above the grade of lieutenant commander.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 8, to insert:

The act "to authorize and provide for the disposal of useless papers in executive departments," approved February 16, 1889, is hereby amended so that accumulations in the files of vessels of the Navy of papers that, in the judgment of the commander in chief, are not needed or useful in the transaction of current business and have no permanent value or historical interest may be disposed of by the commander in chief by sale, after advertisement for proposals, as waste papers if practicable, or if not practicable, then otherwise, as may appear best for the interests of the Government, the commander in chief to make report thereon to the Secretary of the Navy: Provided always, That no papers less than two years old from the date of the last indorsement thereon and no correspondence, or the related papers, with officers or representatives of a foreign Government shall be destroyed or disposed of by such commander in chief.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, beginning with line 1, to insert the following:

Hereafter the commander in chief of the United States Atlantic Fleet and the commander in chief of the United States Pacific Fleet, respectively, shall each, after being designated as such commander in chief by the President, and from the date of assuming command of such fleet until his relinquishment of such command, have the rank and pay of an admiral; and in each of the above-named fleets the officer serving as second in command thereof shall each, after being designated as such second in command by the President, and from the date of assuming duty as such second in command until his relinquishment of such duty, have the rank and pay of a vice admiral; and the grades of admiral and vice admiral in the Navy are hereby reestablished and authorized for the purposes of this section. The annual pay of an admiral shall be $12,000 and of a vice admiral $10,000: Provided, That in time of peace officers to serve as commander in chief and as second in command of the two said fleets shall be designated from among the rear admirals on the active list of the Navy: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall create any vacancy in any grade in the Navy nor increase the total number of officers allowed by existing law, and that when an officer is detached from duty as such commander in chief or as such second in command, as above provided, he shall return to his regular rank in the list of rear admirals, and shall thereafter receive only the pay and allowances of such regular rank.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, before the Chair rules upon the point of order I desire to state that the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate consists of 15 members; it has given consideration to 40 or 50 amendments that have been presented to them, and no amendment has been recommended by the committee unless it has the approval of the entire committee, with one exception.

It seems just and proper from every standpoint that we should establish these grades. Other nations have admirals. England has 4 admirals of the fleet; Germany, 2; Japan, 1. England has 12 admirals; Germany, 5; Japan, 7. England has 22 vice admirals; France, 15; Germany, 12; Japan, 20. England has 55 rear admirals; France, 30; Germany, 22; Japan, 38.

Of course the committee made this recommendation after consulting with the Navy Department. I am sorry that we did not have the benefit of the counsel and advice of the Senator from Kansas, but he has had quite enough to do on the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee brought in more legislation on the military appropriation bill than on any bill that has been presented in my recollection during the 19 years that I have been here. Nevertheless your committee has recommended this amendment and also other amendments. I think as a question of policy it ought to be adopted.

I send to the desk a letter from the head of the department in relation to this matter and ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the communication which he sends to the desk may be read. Without objection, it will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, June 11, 1912.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In accordance with a telephone request from your office this morning referring to page 8, lines 1 to 26, H. R. 24565, the department believes that the enactment of a measure reestablishing the higher grades of flag officers has now become of urgent necessity. This opinion is based on the principle that rank should be commensurate with the importance of the command and should be higher than that of subordinate officers in the same command, also on a consideration of the material national interests likely to become involved.

Fleets are properly commanded by admirals; squadrons, which are smaller than fleets, by vice admirals; and divisions, which are smaller than squadrons, by rear admirals.

The Atlantic Fleet contains five divisions, organized into two squadrons and a separate cruiser division. The proper officers are 1 admiral, 2 vice admirals, and 3 rear admirals; actually all 6 flag officers are of the same rank, rear admiral.

It is customary in international cooperation for the supreme direction to be intrusted to the ranking officer of the combined forces, this irrespective of the standing and interest of his country or of the strength and importance of his command.

There have been fleet reviews recently in England, France, Germany, and the United States. Had these several fleets been cooperating, the American commander in chief would have been outranked by 3 admirals, 10 vice admirals, and 17 rear admirals.

England, France, Germany, and Japan have in the aggregate 243 flag officers, of whom 100 are of higher rank than rear admiral.

The authorized number of flag officers of the United States Navy, apart from the Admiral of the Navy, who holds his office by special provision of law, is 18 rear admirals.

Such conditions are at variance with the importance of the present flag commands in the Navy and with the country's material national interests. They would be somewhat ameliorated by the creation of the limited number of higher flag officers. Believe me,

Faithfully, yours,

G. V. L. MEYER.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment is open to the point of order, but I hope that it will not be made. The House committee reported this provision and it went out on a point of order in the House. This committee reported it unanimously, as did the House committee.

I desire to assure the Senate that it is of very great importance. It has become important owing to the growth of the American Navy into fleets. We now have two fleets. As we are now doing, it is exactly like trying to run the Army with nothing but colonels. It is necessary to have brigadier generals. It is necessary to have major generals. It is necessary in certain cases to have a lieutenant general and general.

We have now an Admiral, of course, created, as is well known, for distinguished service. But this is a provision merely for fleet command. It is to give them proper rank and proper organization when in command of a fleet.

It also gives them during their service as vice admiral or admiral, and no longer, only for the year or two that they have that position, an increase of pay. It will amount to a very few thousand dollars in the long run, because there will not be, at the outside, more than four, owing to the divisions of the fleet. They are obliged to go to foreign ports, and a great burden is thrown upon them, for which provision is made in every other navy by allowances for expenses of entertainment. They have to carry this expense out of their not very large pay now.

It is absolutely necessary, Mr. President, I think, that we should have these ranks if we are to have a proper arrangement of fleets and squadrons and divisions.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me from the facts that can be gleaned from the records of the military establishments of the United States the principal purpose of the higher grade is for retirement privilege.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator understands, of course, that this does not retire them.

Mr. BRISTOW. But it creates the rank of admiral and rear admiral.

Mr. LODGE. Only during the absolute time of command of the fleet. The moment they leave the command they retire. They retire as rear admirals.

Mr. BRISTOW. I can not see any reason why in the command of these fleets the senior officers can not assume command as they always have done heretofore and as they do now.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a significant fact. There are now on the retired list 210 rear admirals. A rear admiral is the highest grade in the Navy at this time. The retired pay of the rear admirals is $1,105,500 per annum. In the grade of commodore, which is the next grade below rear admiral, there are 49 retired commodores. Taking the Army there are 236 retired brigadier generals and but 27 brigadier generals in the active service.

I make the point of order against this amendment because it is general legislation, and I do not think it ought to be enacted on an appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss this question, but on another matter after the Chair has ruled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask to turn back in the bill which is under consideration to page 3, the amendment on which a point of order was made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], beginning on line 9, and including the intervening lines to line 13. I was not present when that matter was disposed of. I notice from the RECORD that there must have been a misapprehension as to the effect of the amendment. The Senator from Kansas stated in making the point of order, as I notice from the RECORD of July 3, that the effect of the amendment would be to retire officers at a higher grade than the one which they held. He said:

I raise the point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation. It is advancing all officers to a grade higher upon retirement than they held.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state that at the time I made that remark I was under the impression that it was another amendment, but after considering the amendment and knowing what its application is, I would still make the point of order against it, because I do not believe it is proper legislation. I think when an officer is confirmed his term of office should begin the same in military life as in civil life.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, if the Senator insists on his point of order, in view of the actual effect of the amendment, I have nothing to say, but I hoped very much that the Senator would withdraw the point of order. The effect of the amendment is simply to allow officers to draw pay of the rank which their commission calls for from the date of the commission.

Mr. BRISTOW. From the date of the commission instead of the date of the confirmation. I think it should be the date of confirmation as the law now requires. I do not see why the law should be changed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The commissions are issued bearing a certain date. It is my opinion, and in that I am perfectly clear, that the officer ought to draw the pay his commission calls for.

Mr. BRISTOW. He is not in that grade until the Senate confirms his appointment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. When the Senate confirms his appointment it dates from the date of the commission.

Mr. BRISTOW. My contention is that the Senate is just as much a part of the appointing power as is the Executive, and until the Senate performs its act the appointment is not made.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay, miscellaneous," in the item of appropriation for commissions and interest, on page 10, line 20, after the words "two hundred and," to strike out "$54,654.25" and insert $80,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and purchasing pay offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shall not exceed $280,000; in all, $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 11, to insert:

That the term of enlistment of all enlisted men of the United States Navy other than those who are enlisted during minority shall be four years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 14, to insert:

That the term of enlistment of any enlisted man in the Navy may, by his voluntary written agreement, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, be extended for a period of either one, two, three, or four full years from the date of expiration of the then existing four-year term of enlistment, and subsequent to said date such enlisted men as extend the term of enlistment as authorized in this section shall be entitled to and shall receive the same pay and allowances in all respects as though regularly discharged and reenlisted immediately upon expiration of their term of enlistment, and such extension shall not operate to deprive them upon discharge at the termination thereof of any right, privilege, or benefit to which they would be entitled at the expiration of a four-year term of enlistment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 4, to insert:

That section 1,573 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "If any enlisted man or apprentice, being honorably discharged, shall reenlist for four years within four months thereafter, he shall, on presenting his honorable discharge or on accounting in a satisfactory manner for its loss, be entitled to a gratuity of four months' pay equal in amount to that which he would have received if he had been employed in actual service: Provided, That any enlisted man in the Navy whose term of enlistment has been extended for an aggregate of four years shall, after the expiration of the preceding four-year term of enlistment upon which the extension is made and if otherwise entitled to an honorable discharge, be paid the gratuity above provided: And provided, That any man who has received an honorable discharge from his last term of enlistment, or who has received a recommendation for reenlistment upon the expiration of his last term of enlistment, who reenlists for a term of four years within four months from the date of his discharge, shall receive an increase of $1.36 per month to the pay prescribed for the rating in which he serves for each successive reenlistment: And provided further, That an extension of the period of enlistment as hereinbefore authorized, aggregating four years, shall be held and considered as equivalent to continuous service with respect to all rights, privileges, and benefits granted for such service pursuant to law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 5, to insert:

That under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, with the approval of the President, any enlisted man may be discharged at any time within three months before the expiration of his term of enlistment or extended enlistment without prejudice to any right, privilege, or benefit that he would have received, or to which he would thereafter become entitled, had he served his full term of enlistment or extended enlistment: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to reduce or increase the pay and allowances of enlisted men of the Navy now authorized pursuant to law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 9, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to transfer all the lepers of Guam now segregated, and other cases that may later appear, to such island possession of the United States as in his judgment may be best adapted to the permanent care and segregation of such sufferers, and to pay the cost of their transfer and maintenance from this appropriation.

So as to make the clause read:

Care of lepers, island of Guam: Naval station, island of Guam: Maintenance and care of lepers, special patients, and for other purposes, $14,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to transfer all the lepers of Guam now segregated, and other cases that may later appear, to such island possession of the United States as in his judgment may be best adapted to the permanent care and segregation of such sufferers, and to pay the cost of their transfer and maintenance from this appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Navigation," on page 15, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seven hundred and fifty thousand" and insert "eight hundred and forty-three thousand two hundred and fifty," so as to make the clause read:

Transportation: For travel allowance of enlisted men discharged on account of expiration of enlistment; transportation of enlisted men and apprentice seamen at home and abroad, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation to their homes, if residents of the United States, of enlisted men and apprentice seamen discharged on medical survey, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of sick or insane enlisted men and apprentice seamen to hospitals, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation, $843,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty-five," so as to read:

Recruiting: Expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties, $145,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight hundred and seventy thousand" and insert "nine hundred and sixty-seven thousand seven hundred and seventeen," so as to make the clause read:

Outfits on first enlistment: Outfits for all enlisted men and apprentice seamen of the Navy on first enlistment, at not to exceed $60 each, $967,717.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-two thousand four hundred and eighty" and insert "twenty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty," so as to read:

Naval War College, Rhode Island: For maintenance of the Naval War College on Coasters Harbor Island, and care of grounds for same, $23,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the maintenance of the Naval War College, Rhode Island, on page 20, line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight thousand nine hundred and eighty" and insert "ten thousand two hundred and fifty," and, in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-eight thousand five hundred and eighty" and insert "twenty-nine thousand eight hundred and fifty," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, inspection, drafting, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shall not exceed $10,250. In all, Naval War College, Rhode Island, $29,850.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Ordnance," in the items of appropriation for ordnance and ordnance stores, on page 24, line 17, after the word "proposals," to insert:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to make emergency purchases of war material abroad: And provided further, That when such purchases are made abroad this material shall be admitted free of duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 22, before the words "of smokeless powder," to strike out "Manufacture" and insert "Purchase and manufacture"; in line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "nine hundred" and insert "one million one hundred and fifty"; and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That the plant for the manufacture of smokeless powder at Indianhead may be enlarged and extended to meet as nearly as may be the necessities of the Navy, including the purchase of additional land, necessary dredging, the erection of additional buildings, purchase of additional machinery, and such other objects as may be necessary to the efficient extension of the plant at a total cost not exceeding $650,000, toward which the sum of $325,000 is hereby appropriated out of any sums in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, at this point, to follow the amendment just adopted, I desire to offer, with the permission of the chairman of the committee, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to, on page 25, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to exchange such quantities of potassium nitrate now in store as may not be needed in the manufacture of black powder for sodium nitrate of equal value for use in the manufacture of smokeless powder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 27, after line 6, to insert:

Mines and mine appliances: For naval-defense mines, appliances, and accessories for mine ships, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 18, to insert:

Hereafter appropriations for the naval service under the headings "Ammunition for ships of the Navy," "Fire-control instruments for ships of the Navy," "Small arms and machine guns," "Torpedoes and appliances," "Experiments, Bureau of Ordnance," "New batteries for ships of the Navy," "Arming and equipping Naval Militia," "Modernizing projectiles," "Modernizing turrets of ships of the Navy," "Naval Gun Factory, Washington, D. C.," and "Battle compasses" shall be available for obligation for two fiscal years: Provided, That the balances unobligated on January 11, 1912, under any of these appropriations shall be available for obligation until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 8, to strike out the subhead "Bureau of Equipment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for equipment of vessels, on page 30, line 16, before the words "shore stations," to strike out "wireless telegraph" and insert "radio"; in line 19, after the words "work in," to strike out "wireless telegraphy" and insert "radio telegraphy"; and in line 20, after the word "naval," to strike out "wireless telegraph" and insert "radio," so as to read:

Service and supplies for coast signal service, including the purchase of land as necessary for sites for radio shore stations; instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals required to carry on experimental and research work in radio telegraphy at the naval radio laboratory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 14, before the words "shore stations," to strike out "wireless telegraph" and insert "radio"; and in line 17, before the word "laboratory," to strike out "wireless telegraph" and insert "radio," so as to read:

Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for the purchase of land for sites for radio shore stations shall not exceed $50,000: Provided further, That the total expenditures under this appropriation at the naval radio laboratory shall not exceed $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 20, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Provided, That the coal purchased by the Government shall be mined by labor that is employed not exceeding eight hours a day.

So as to make the clause read:

Coal and transportation: Coal and other fuel for steamers' and ships' use, and other equipment purposes, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same, and for the general maintenance of naval coaling depots and coaling plants, water for all purposes on board naval vessels, including the expenses of transportation and storage of the same, $4,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 22, to insert:

Depots for coal: To enable the Secretary of the Navy to execute the provisions of section 1552 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to establish, at such places as he may deem necessary, suitable depots for coal and other fuel for the supply of steamships of war, $500,000: Provided, That $75,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the mining of coal and development work on public lands in Alaska for the purpose of supplying coal for the United States Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 18, to insert:

Toward the purchase and preparation of necessary sites, purchase and erection of towers and buildings, and the purchase and installation of machinery and apparatus of high-power radio stations (cost not to exceed $1,000,000), to be located as follows: One in the Isthmian Canal Zone, one on the California coast, one in the Hawaiian Islands, one in American Samoa, one on the island of Guam, and one in the Philippine Islands, $400,000, to be available until expended.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that amendment is new legislation, that it is not estimated for, and that it is not relevant to the bill.

Mr. LODGE. It has been estimated for, Mr. President.

Mr. BRIGGS. When?

Mr. LODGE. The estimate has been furnished to us and is here before us.

Mr. BRIGGS. I say that it was not estimated for as a regular estimate.

Mr. LODGE. No; it was sent in as a supplemental estimate; but it has been estimated for and, I think, is clearly in order. It is an amendment reported from a committee providing for work that has frequently been done by the Navy and is in continuance of its regular work. It is a matter of the utmost importance. It was reported by the House committee and is to give us a wireless system from certain points in the Pacific Ocean of enormous importance and value commercially. I do not think the point of order would lie, but, in any event, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, this proposition, if adopted, would simply embark the Government on a new commercial enterprise and would occasion unnecessary expenditure, for the same thing can be accomplished in other ways without expense to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Has the item been estimated for?

Mr. LODGE. I have the estimate in my hand.

Mr. BRIGGS. I make the point that it is new legislation and also is in contravention of paragraph 3 of Rule XVI. I claim it is out of order on that ground.

Mr. LODGE. I hold in my hand an estimate for the item sent in by the department. Radio telegraphy or any form of signaling in the Navy is a part of the regular work of the Navy; it is a work that is being done by the Navy all over the world, and this simply provides for increasing the system. It is an extension of or an addition to the naval work and rests on the same ground as the increase in the Navy in battleships or in any other way, which has been held in order repeatedly in the other House, where the rules are much narrower than here. The amendment has also been reported by a standing committee, which takes it out of the rule referred to by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. PERKINS. It has also received the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and I ask that the letter from him which I send to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 28, 1912.

Hon. GEO. C. PERKINS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

SIR: The department has this day forwarded to the Honorable the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission to Congress, a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, as follows:

Bureau of Equipment: Navy wireless-telegraph stations, $1,000,000.

It is suggested that this item, if it meets with the approval of Congress, be included in the naval bill immediately following the appropriation "Equipment of vessels."

Respectfully, yours, G. v. L. MEYER.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, I still think that the amendment is new legislation, and, further, that it is contrary to paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, which provides:

Nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks, it having been estimated for and reported by a committee, that, under the rulings heretofore by other presiding officers, the amendment is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, line 24, after the words "California coast," it is proposed to insert the following: "One on the Washington or Alaska coast."

Mr. PERKINS. The committee has no objection to either one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BRIGGS. I hope the amendment will be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is first upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would ask that the Senate recur to a previous amendment, and that it be passed over. It was read rapidly.

Mr. LODGE. What amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. The one in reference to the mining of coal. I ask that it be passed over.

Mr. LODGE. What amendment does the Senator refer to?

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment at the bottom of page 32 and the top of page 33.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment regarding depots for coal?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the mining of coal. It provides—

That $75,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the mining of coal.

And so forth.

Mr. LODGE. Under the head of "depots for coal"?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as passed over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just the portion of it with reference to the mining of coal.

The SECRETARY. The proviso beginning on line 4, page 33, and going down to and including line 8.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer an amendment, on line 4, page 33, to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "two hundred and fifty."

Mr. LODGE. That whole amendment has just been passed over temporarily.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well; then I give notice of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning at line 4, page 34.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 34, line 24, after the date "1912," to strike out "Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress at the beginning of its next ensuing session the distribution of the duties of the Bureau of Equipment made by him under the authorization herein granted, with full statement in relation to said distribution and the performance of navy-yard work therein involved," and insert "Provided further, That the Bureau of Equipment in the Navy Department be, and the same is hereby, abolished, and the duties heretofore performed under that bureau shall be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy shall judge to be expedient and proper among the other bureaus of the Navy Department," so as to make the clause read:

Distribution of duties: That duties assigned by law to the Bureau of Equipment shall be distributed among the other bureaus and offices of the Navy Department in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy shall consider expedient and proper during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized and directed to assign and transfer to said other bureaus and offices, respectively, all available funds heretofore and hereby appropriated for the Bureau of Equipment and such civil employees of the bureau as are authorized by law, and when such distribution of duties, funds, and employees shall have been completed, the Bureau of Equipment shall be discontinued as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to authorize the expenditure of any appropriation for purposes other than those specifically provided by the terms of the appropriations, or the submission of estimates for the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year 1914, except in accordance with the order and arrangement of the naval appropriation act for the year 1912: Provided further, That the Bureau of Equipment in the Navy Department be, and the same is hereby, abolished, and the duties heretofore performed under that bureau shall be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy shall judge to be expedient and proper among the other bureaus of the Navy Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 10, to insert:

That the Hydrographic Office, now assigned by law to the Bureau of Equipment, shall be attached to and be a part of such bureau of the Navy Department as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, after line 14, to insert:

That all available funds heretofore and herein appropriated for and such civil employees of the Bureau of Equipment as the Secretary of the Navy may designate shall be assigned to the other bureaus of the Navy Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 36, line 11, before the word "thousand," to insert "and forty," so as to read:

Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks: For general maintenance of yards and docks, namely: For books, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants; machinery; purchase and maintenance of horses and driving teams; carts, timber wheels, and all vehicles, including motor-propelled vehicles for freight-carrying purposes only for use in the navy yards; tools and repair of the same; stationery; furniture for Government houses and offices in navy yards and naval stations; coal and other fuel; candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up yards and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, and fire apparatus and plants; incidental labor at navy yards; water tax, tolls, and ferriage; pay of watchmen in navy yards; awnings and packing boxes; and for pay of employees on leave, $1,540,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 37, line 2, after the word "dollars," to insert "continuing extension of quay wall, $100,000"; and in line 3, after the words "in all," to insert "one hundred and," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, Portsmouth, N. H.: Crane track and railroad extension, $20,000; tool house for naval prison, $2,000; quarters for commanding officer, naval prison, $12,000; improvement and additions to power plant, $10,000; continuing extension of quay wall, $100,000; in all, $144,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "rebuilding building No. 7, $50,000," and in line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "eighty," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa.: Sanitation system, reserve basin, to complete, $45,000; Pier No. 5, to extend, $75,000; water-closets and laundry, $10,000; rebuilding building No. 7, $50,000; in all, navy yard, Philadelphia, $180,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 17, after the word "electric," to strike out "light," and in line 18, after the word "repairs," to strike out "to," so as to make the paragraph read:

Navy yard, Norfolk, Va.: Railroad tracks, extensions, $5,000; electric plant, extensions, $20,000; repairs, buildings, St. Helena, $25,000; improvements to water front, $50,000; paving and grading, $10,000; heating system, extension, $15,000; water-closets and lavatories for ships in dock, $15,000; incinerator, St. Helena, $5,000; in all, navy yard, Norfolk, Va., $145,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert "improvements to water front, $300,000," and in line 8, before the word "thirty-nine," to insert "three hundred and," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, Charleston, S. C.: Paving and grading, to continue, $5,000; railroad system, extensions and improvements, $5,000; conduit system extension, $5,000; bathroom and lavatories for enlisted men, $4,000; storehouse for oil, $20,000; improvements to water front, $300,000; in all, $339,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 11, after the word "dollars," to strike out "in all, $30,000" and insert "paving and grading on Whitehead, Front, and Green Streets where abutting on naval station, $5,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, however, That the cost of the United States Government's share for paving and grading said streets shall not exceed one-fourth of the total cost thereof; in all, $35,500," so as to make the clause read:

Naval station, Key West, Fla.: Power plant, $25,000; grading and paving, $5,000; paving and grading on Whitehead, Front, and Green Streets where abutting on naval station, $5,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, however, That the cost of the United States Government's share for paving and grading said streets shall not exceed one-fourth of the total cost thereof; in all, $35,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 15, to insert:

The appropriation made by the naval act approved June 24, 1910, for a torpedo station near the Pacific coast of the United States, is hereby reappropriated and such part as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary is made available for expenditure for the same purposes at the naval station, Puget Sound, Wash.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three hundred and fifty thousand" and insert "four hundred and eighty-six thousand five hundred," and in the same line, after the word "to," to strike out "complete" and insert "continue," so as to read:

Naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii: Dry dock (limit of cost is hereby increased to $3,486,500), to continue, $1,050,000; water-front development, $100,000; street paving, $25,000.

Mr. REED. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee why that increase from $3,350,000 to $3,486,500 is made.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state that the Navy Department find it necessary to have this additional sum, and make this recommendation for the reason that they found quicksands in sinking excavations for the dry dock in Pearl Harbor, Hawaiian Islands. This is only to authorize them to expend that much more money if it is found absolutely necessary. We acted entirely upon the recommendation of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me to add one word, in digging they found it became necessary to use what they call a richer concrete, a stronger concrete, on account of the condition of the earth; and to complete the work it is necessary to increase the total amount. But they have ample to cover it, and it will result in no additional appropriation for 1913.

Mr. PERKINS. It is simply that the limit may be extended.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to understand the reason for it, as it is a large item.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly. I will state to the Senator that in the report I made to the Senate that matter is all covered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 22, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to purchase, from the appropriation "Naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, fresh-water system," made by the act of March 4, 1911, 1 acre, more or less, of land in the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, for the location of wells for supplying fresh water to the naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and to acquire a right of way for a pipe line from such wells to the naval station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 20, after the word "dollars," to insert "underground conduit and lighting system, to extend, $5,000; in all, $15,000," so as to make the clause read:

Naval training station, Rhode Island, buildings: Repairs to barracks "B" and "C," $10,000; underground conduit and lighting system, to extend, $5,000; in all, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. On page 43, after line 2, in the Naval Observatory clause, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, after line 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to arrange for the exchange of data with such foreign almanac offices as he may from time to time deem desirable with a view to reducing the amount of duplication of work in preparing the different national nautical and astronomical almanacs and increasing the total data which may be of use to navigators and astronomers available for publication in the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac: Provided, That any such arrangement shall be terminable on one year's notice: Provided further, That the work of the Nautical Almanac Office during the continuance of any such arrangement shall be conducted so that in case of emergency the entire portion of the work intended for the use of navigators may be computed by the force employed by that office and without any foreign cooperation whatsoever: Provided further, That any employee of the Nautical Almanac Office who may be authorized in any annual appropriation bill and whose services in whole or in part can be spared from the duty of preparing for publication the annual volumes of the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac may be employed by said office in the duty of improving the tables of the planets, moon, and stars, to be used in preparing for publication the annual volumes of the office: Provided further, That section 435, Revised Statutes, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 9, after the word "dollars," to insert "one set of double quarters for commissioned officers, $18,000"; and in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "nineteen" and insert "thirty-seven," so as to make the clause read:

Naval proving ground, Indianhead, Md.: Repairs to wharf and coal-handling plant at powder factory, $10,000; new surveillance magazine, $1,500; two dry houses for smokeless powder, $7,500; purchase of 5 acres (more or less) of additional land, $200; one set of double quarters for commissioned officers, $18,000; in all, naval proving ground, Indianhead, $37,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 44, to insert:

Naval magazine, Fort Lafayette, N. Y.: Dredging channel, widening water approach, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert "water pipe mains, $4,000; fire and boundary wall, $5,000"; and in line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "twenty-six," so as to make the clause read:

Naval magazine, Lake Denmark, N. J.: One locomotive house, $2,500; one magazine building, including clearing, preparing, grading of site, railroad tracks, $15,000; water pipe mains, $4,000; fire and boundary wall, $5,000; in all, $26,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "improvements to water front, $22,000; assembly and repair shop, $50,000"; and in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred and thirty-five" and insert "two hundred and seven," so as to make the clause read:

Naval torpedo station, Newport, R. I.: New power house, toward building (cost not to exceed $60,000) and equipping (cost not to exceed $120,000), to complete, $120,000; paving, $5,000; extension of fresh-water, steam-heating, and conduit system, $10,000; improvements to water front, $22,000; assembly and repair shop, $50,000; in all, $207,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert "one general magazine, $13,000; one shell house, $20,000; in all, $73,000," so as to make the clause read:

Naval magazine, Hingham, Mass.: Improvement of channel, $40,000; one general magazine, $13,000; one shell house, $20,000; in all, $73,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 20, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four million five hundred and seventy-eight thousand eight" and insert "five million one hundred and eighty-six thousand three," so as to make the clause read:

Total public works, navy yards, naval stations, naval proving grounds and magazines, Naval Academy, Naval Observatory, and Marine Corps, $5,186,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," on page 47, line 2, before the word "thousand," to insert "and thirty," so as to make the clause read:

Medical Department: For surgeons' necessaries for vessels in commission, navy yards, naval stations, Marine Corps, and for the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy yards, naval medical supply depots, Naval Medical School, Washington, and Naval Academy, $430,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "Contingent, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," on page 47, line 9, after the word "of," to insert "and," so as to read:

For tolls and ferriages; care, transportation, and burial of the dead; purchase of books and stationery, binding of medical records, unbound books, and pamphlets; hygienic and sanitary investigation and illustration; sanitary and hygienic instruction; purchase and repairs of wagons, automobile ambulances, and harness; purchase of and feed for horses and cows; trees, plants, garden tools, and seeds, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for "Contingent, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," on page 47, line 23, after the words "Pacific coast," to insert "for dental outfits and dental material, not to exceed $15,000," and on page 48, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty-two" and insert "ninety-seven," so as to read:

For the care, maintenance, and treatment of the insane of the Navy and Marine Corps on the Pacific coast; for dental outfits and dental material, not to exceed $15,000, and all other necessary contingent expenses; in all, $97,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and ninety-seven" and insert "five hundred and forty-two," so as to make the clause read:

In all, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, $542,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 2, before the words "dental surgeons," to strike out "assistant," and in line 3, before the words "dental surgeons," to strike out "assistant," so as to make the clause read:

That the appointment of not more than 30 dental surgeons be, and the same is hereby, authorized, said dental surgeons to be a part of the Medical Department of the United States Navy, to serve professionally the personnel of the naval service, and to perform such other duties as may be prescribed by competent authority.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 6, to insert:

That there shall be 1 dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant commander, 4 passed assistant dental surgeons with the rank of lieutenant, and 25 assistant and acting assistant dental surgeons with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade), to be appointed and promoted as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 17, before the word "years," to strike out "not over 27" and insert "between 24 and 32," so as to read:

That all original appointments herein authorized shall be made by the Secretary of the Navy in the grade of acting assistant dental surgeon, and all appointees to such grade shall be citizens of the United States, between 24 and 32 years of age, and shall be graduates of standard medical or dental colleges, trained in the several branches of dentistry, of good moral character, of unquestionable professional repute, and before appointment shall pass satisfactory physical and professional examinations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 12, after the words "in this," to strike out "section" and insert "act," so as to make the clause read:

That at the end of three years from the passage of this act all acting assistant dental surgeons who have had two or more years' service under their original appointment, as herein provided, shall undergo such physical and competitive professional examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe to determine their fitness to receive commissions in the Navy, and if found qualified they shall be appointed assistant dental surgeons, with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade), in the order of standing as determined by the professional examinations provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 12, to insert:

That at the end of three years from the date of the examinations provided for in this act all assistant dental surgeons shall undergo such physical and competitive professional examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe to determine their fitness for promotion to fill the theretofore existing vacancies in the grade of passed assistant dental surgeon, and said vacancies shall be filled by the four officers, if qualified, standing highest as a result of the professional examinations provided for in this act and in the order of their standing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 22, to strike out:

That after the competitive examinations provided for in section 3 of this act have been held, acting assistant dental surgeons thereafter appointed shall serve a probationary period of three years, and upon the completion of such period shall undergo such examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe to determine their fitness to receive commissions in the Navy, and, if found qualified, they shall be appointed assistant dental surgeons with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade).

And in lieu to insert:

That at the end of five years from the date of the examinations provided for in this act the senior officer in the grade of passed assistant dental surgeon shall undergo such physical and professional examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe to determine his fitness for promotion to fill the theretofore existing vacancy in the grade of dental surgeon, and said vacancy shall be filled by said officer, if qualified, as a result of the professional examinations provided for in this act: Provided, That if said officer be found not qualified the provisions of this act shall apply successively in order of rank to the other officers of lower seniority in said grade of passed assistant dental surgeon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, after line 18, to insert:

That after the competitive examinations provided for in this act have been held, acting assistant dental surgeons thereafter appointed shall serve a probationary period of three years, and upon the completion of such period shall undergo such examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe to determine their fitness to receive commissions in the Navy, and, if found qualified, they shall be appointed assistant dental surgeons, with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade): Provided, That all promotions among said dental surgeons other than the promotions provided for in this act shall be made in the same manner and under the same relative conditions, so far as applicable, as now are or may hereafter be prescribed in pursuance of law for officers of the Medical Corps of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 9, after the words "prescribed in," to strike out "sections 3 and 4 of," and in line 11, before the word "dental," to insert "assistant," so as to make the clause read:

That if any acting assistant dental surgeon shall fail upon the examinations prescribed in this act he shall be honorably discharged from the naval service, and the appointment of an acting assistant dental surgeon may be revoked at any time in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 15, after the word "precedence," to strike out "next below other officers of the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) now or hereafter commissioned in the Navy" and insert "in the same manner in all respects as in the case of appointees to the Medical Corps of the Navy," so as to make the clause read:

That all appointees authorized by this act shall take rank and precedence in the same manner in all respects as in the case of appointees to the Medical Corps of the Navy and shall not exercise command over persons in the Navy other than dental surgeons and such enlisted men as may be detailed to assist them by competent authority.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 53, to insert:

Provided, That acting assistant surgeons in the Navy shall receive the same pay and allowances as are now or may hereafter be provided by law for assistant surgeons in the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 5, after the words "authorized by," to strike out "the preceding sections of," and in line 6, after the word "retirement," to insert "at the age of 70 years," so as to read:

That all officers authorized by this act shall be eligible to retirement at the age of 70 years in the same manner and under the same conditions as officers of the Medical Corps of the Navy: Provided, That section 1445 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be applicable to the officers herein authorized: And provided further, That the dentist now employed at the Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the operation of this act.

Mr. PERKINS. On page 53, line 5, the first line in the paragraph, after the word "officers," I move to insert the words "of the Dental Corps."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from California will permit me, I should like to offer an amendment at this point that I feel sure he will accept. I would not offer it now except that I have to leave the Chamber to attend a committee meeting.

I ask the Secretary first to read the proviso on page 53, lines 12 and 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proviso.

The Secretary read as follows:

And provided further, That the dentist now employed at the Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the operation of this act.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the end of line 13 I move to add:

And he shall have the same official status, pay, and allowances as may be provided for the senior dental surgeon at the Military Academy.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me curious that the bill expressly provides that a certain man shall continue to hold his position.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the provision in the bill as it passed the House, that the dental surgeon at the Naval Academy shall not be displaced. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that there are more boys at the Naval Academy than there are at the Military Academy. They have two dental surgeons at the Military Academy and one at the Naval Academy. We have legislated so as to give both the surgeons at the Military Academy a higher salary than the dentist at the Naval Academy. Not only that, but this bill creates a corps of assistant dental surgeons, and every one of those dental surgeons would have a higher salary than the man who has been serving at the Naval Academy since 1889, I believe. This amendment simply provides that he shall have equivalent pay with the senior dental surgeon at the Military Academy. It is but fair.

Mr. REED. I was not addressing myself to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. I see no objection to that amendment, if the other language is to remain, but what strikes me as curious and upon which I desire to have some light, is why a bill should specifically provide that a particular individual should continue to hold a particular place. There is undoubtedly some reason for it and I ask for light.

Mr. PERKINS. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that this provision was inserted by the House of Representatives, and undoubtedly they had light on the subject or they would not have recommended it.

Mr. LODGE. This dentist, who has been for some time at the Naval Academy, as the Senator from New Hampshire stated, would have been removed by the operation of the creation of a corps, and the House, wishing to retain him, put in that special clause.

Mr. REED. I have no desire to take the time of the Senate in opposing a matter of this kind, but I wish to say, as a general proposition, that it strikes me as being a very bad practice when an appropriation bill is written to write into it provisions that certain people shall retain their positions. To provide for the retention of a position is all right, but to provide that a certain man shall continue to hold that position is, in my judgment, not the best practice.

I have nothing further to say. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to move to strike out, but I do not think it is good practice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 13, to strike out:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to appoint, for temporary service, suitably qualified acting dental surgeons when necessary to the health and efficiency of the personnel of the Naval Service: Provided, That the total strength of the dental corps, including those appointed for temporary service under this section, shall not exceed the proportion of one to each thousand of the authorized enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps: Provided further, That appointments issued under authority of this section may be revoked at any time, shall have no legal force or effect except for the time the temporary appointee is in active service, and shall include no right of retirement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 2, before the word "dental," to insert "assistant," so as to make the clause read:

That all appointments authorized by this act, except the appointment of acting assistant dental surgeons, shall be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 12, on page 54.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer an amendment to be inserted after line 12. I understand it is satisfactory to the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 12, on page 54, the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That of the dental surgeons hereby authorized to be appointed to the said Medical Reserve Corps and to the said dental corps, the whole number ordered to active duty shall not exceed the number the Secretary of the Navy may deem actually necessary to the health and efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps, and in time of peace the number shall not exceed the proportion of one dental officer to 1,000 of said personnel.

Mr. PERKINS. The committee are willing to accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 12, to insert:

That pharmacists shall, after six years from date of warrant, be commissioned chief pharmacists after passing satisfactorily such examination as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, and shall, on promotion, have the rank, pay, and allowances of chief boatswains.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," in the item of appropriation for provisions of the Navy, on page 56, line 2, after the words "shall not exceed," to strike out "$492,299.36" and insert "$520,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to commute rations for such general courts-martial prisoners in such amounts as seem to him proper, which may vary in accordance with the location of the naval prison, but which shall in no case exceed 30 cents per diem for each ration so commuted; labor in general storehouses and paymasters' offices in navy yards, including naval stations maintained in island possessions under the control of the United States, and expenses in handling stores purchased and manufactured under the general account of advances; and for the purchase of United States Army emergency rations, as required: Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for chemists and for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in the general storehouses and paymasters' offices of the navy yards and naval stations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, shall not exceed $520,000. In all, $8,542,328.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Construction and Repair," on page 57, line 2, after the word "aeroplanes," to strike out "(not to exceed $10,000)," so as to read:

Construction and repair of vessels: For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; steam steerers, pneumatic steerers, steam capstans, steam windlasses, aeroplanes, and all other auxiliaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Steam Engineering," on page 60, line 6, after the word "dollars," to strike out "Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for aeroplane machinery shall not exceed $20,000," so as to make the clause read:

Steam machinery: For completion, repairing, and preservation of machinery and boilers of naval vessels, including cost of new boilers; distilling, refrigerating, aeroplane, and auxiliary machinery; preservation of and small repairs to machinery and boilers in vessels in ordinary, receiving and training vessels; repair and care of machinery of yard tugs and launches and for pay of classified force under the bureau, $4,250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Commissary department," on page 64, line 22, after the word "dollars," to insert "Provided, That such additional payments from the midshipmen's commissary fund, as the Superintendent of the Naval Academy may deem necessary, may be made to the waiters herein authorized," so as to make the clause read:

Commissary department: One chief cook, $1,200; 4 cooks, at $600 each, and 8 assistants, at $300 each; 1 steward, $1,200, and 1 assistant, $600; one head waiter, $720, and 2 assistants, at $480 each; 2 pantrymen, at $420 each; 1 chief baker, $1,200; 1 baker, $600; 2 assistants, at $540 each, and 1 assistant, $420; necessary waiters, at $16 per month each, $13,440; 1 messenger to the superintendent, $600; 27 attendants, at $300 each; in all, $35,760: Provided, That such additional payments from the midshipmen's commissary fund, as the Superintendent of the Naval Academy may deem necessary, may be made to the waiters herein authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, after line 18, to strike out:

Expenses of the Board of Visitors of the Naval Academy, $600: Provided, That so much of the act approved February 14, 1879, as relates to the constitution of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy be amended and reenacted to read as follows.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 66, to strike out:

That hereafter the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy shall consist of five members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate and seven members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the respective chairmen thereof; the members so appointed shall visit the Naval Academy annually at such time or times as the chairmen of said committees shall appoint, and the members from each of said committees may visit said academy together or separately as the said committees may elect during the session of Congress; and the superintendent of the academy and the members of the Board of Visitors shall be notified of such date by the chairmen of the said committees. The expenses of the members of the board shall be their actual expenses while engaged upon their duties as members of said board not exceeding $5 per day and their actual expenses of travel by the shortest mail routes: Provided further, That so much of the act approved February 14, 1879, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, as is inconsistent with the provisions of this act is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, after line 22, to insert:

Expenses of the Board of Visitors of the Naval Academy, being mileage and $5 per diem for each member for expenses during actual attendance at the academy, and for clerk hire, carriages, and other incidental and necessary expenses of the board, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "forty-three thousand six hundred" and insert "forty-six thousand," so as to make the clause read:

In all, current and miscellaneous expenses, $46,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 68, line 11, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seventy-eight thousand two" and insert "eighty thousand six," so as to make the clause read:

In all, Naval Academy, $580,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Marine Corps," on page 71, line 2, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one thousand eight hundred" and insert "two thousand," so as to make the clause read:

In the office of the paymaster: One chief clerk, at $2,000; one clerk, at $1,500; one clerk, at $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one thousand eight hundred" and insert "two thousand," so as to make the clause read:

In the office of the adjutant and inspector: One chief clerk, at $2,000; 1 clerk, at $1,500; 1 clerk (in lieu of 1 clerk in the office of the assistant adjutant and inspector), $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "seven," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for pay of civil force, $30,711.28; and the money herein specifically appropriated for pay of the Marine Corps shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as pay of the Marine Corps, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "eighty-six thousand seven" and insert "eighty-seven thousand one," so as to make the clause read:

In all, pay, Marine Corps, $4,387,121.78.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 18, on page 73.

Mr. PERKINS. On page 73, line 17, after the word "quality," I move to strike out the proviso which reads as follows:

Provided, That the coal shall be mined by labor that is employed at not exceeding eight hours per day.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, why is that amendment offered?

Mr. PERKINS. Because the coal is mined by the ton and not by the day, and it is not possible to apply an eight-hour day to it.

Mr. REED. The coal is obtained in this country principally?

Mr. PERKINS. Altogether.

Mr. REED. I should like to inquire why we can not get coal that is mined by labor at eight hours a day.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the coal, as the committee is informed, is mined and paid for by the ton, and the transportation that brings it is paid by the day or month. The Navy Department inform us that if this clause goes through as it is it will be utterly impossible for the department to get coal for a considerable time until they can establish supplies of their own. It will simply tie up the ships. They could not do anything if this is passed suddenly in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 75, line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert: "Provided, That authority is hereby granted to employ the services of an advertising agent in advertising for recruits under such terms and conditions as are most advantageous to the Government," so as to make the clause read:

Transportation and recruiting, Marine Corps: For transportation of troops, and of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruit depots or posts, including ferriage and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; toilet kits for issue to recruits upon their first enlistment and the expense of the recruiting service, $317,000: Provided, That authority is hereby granted to employ the services of an advertising agent in advertising for recruits under such terms and conditions as are most advantageous to the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 78, line 21, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "nine," so as to make the clause read:

Total Marine Corps, exclusive of public works, $7,425,978.78.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Increase of the Navy," at the top of page 79, to insert:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed two first-class battleships, each carrying as heavy armor and as powerful armament as any vessel of its class, to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $7,425,000 each.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to move to amend the paragraph. In line 3 I move to strike out "two battleships" and insert "one battleship."

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have now under construction 6 battleships, 13 destroyers, 5 colliers, 2 seagoing tugs, and 18 submarines. These are already provided for by law, and when completed will cost the Government $100,000,000. I ask leave to insert a table which has been prepared showing the special vessels under construction.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, instead of entering into competition with foreign nations in building battleships, one for every two of England and one for every one of Germany, France, or Japan—instead of being governed in our expenditures or following the pace set by these nations, it would be far better, both for ourselves and for the burdened taxpayers of foreign nations, to endeavor to provide treaties that would put an end to these struggles for supremacy and these vast and unnecessary wastes of public funds. The burden of every appropriation, the final incidence of every dollar expended by this Government, falls upon the citizens, rich and poor, of the United States. The glory that was Rome, the games and largess of its emperors, made many a Roman holiday and bent with toil many a Roman citizen or else extinguished the light of happiness in provincial cottages. A nation has no riches by inheritance or by speculation. The last cent of its revenue is taken from the pockets of the people. Great ships do not spring from mere ideas of grandeur, but are slowly constructed by the sweat of a nation.

Whenever we build a war vessel England builds two and Germany, France, and Japan build one; thus six ships, not one, are involved when the Congress of the United States increases its Navy by one. At least $75,000,000 of energy are wrung from five nations and wasted as utterly and remorselessly as by fire. Some, in the face of this fact, advocate that we shall build enough battleships to command both the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, which, even if England stood still in her construction and addition to her navy, would require the expenditure of billions of dollars, would extend the income tax into every home, take its toll from every wage and income, and abolish for all time the bright dream of tariff reduction. In 1900 our appropriations for the Navy were about $55,000,000. Last year they were $120,000,000, and with all the paring down of a Democratic House, and after eliminating excess battleships, the present House bill calls for $118,547,137.48, and this bill adds over $15,000,000.

When are we to stop? How long will it take at this pace to saddle upon the backs of our people burdens they can only bear by denying their families the necessities of life? Very few of our people, with sound minds and sound appetites, would have their hunger assuaged by the knowledge that we had the second greatest Navy in the world. Ideas of grandeur fill the mind, not the stomach.

The militarism of the German Empire has imposed such burdens upon their people that they have been forced to Socialism and other fancied panaceas of brotherhood in the hope of relief. Monarchical grandeur has no place in a republic. The American people must not be sweated out of taxes to provide pageants. Montesquieu was wise when, in speaking of the corruption of democracy, he said that the people themselves are corrupted when false leaders—to disguise their own ambition speak to them only of the grandeur of the state. (Book VIII, 2.)

All grandeur, force, and power are relative. Care, therefore, must be taken that in endeavoring to increase the real grandeur the relative be not diminished. (Book IX, 9.)

The total revenue of the Government is about $1,000,000,000, or an average of $10 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. Of this vast sum over $600,000,000, or an average of nearly $6 for each person, is expended for war or in preparation for or in reparation of the ravages of war. This requires over $12,000,000 from the people of Alabama.

We should now determine our policy. Is the United States to proceed upon this delirium of paranoia and invite the fevered unrest which has followed lavish military outlay in every European country, or shall we forestall that result by reducing the burden of taxation and applying our revenue to works of permanent usefulness and of benefit to the common people who must stand the burden?

Our policy not many years since was to build one ship each year. Now, when the Panama Canal is almost completed, linking the oceans together and satisfying the supposed necessity for two fleets, one on the Atlantic and the other on the Pacific, we are asked to build two or four each year, and a few warriors, to whom war is a stage and not the grim reality of hell, advocate six.

I have seen war. It extends beyond the wounds and deaths upon the battle field to the homes of the people. We have scarcely recovered from the conflict between the States now after 50 years. That war cost in money and destruction of property over $5,000,000,000 and the lives of the flower of the manhood of this country. In money burden we still have as a legacy nearly $200,000,000 a year to disburse in pensions. Our gigantic outlay for purposes of war, curtailed or diverted to the uses of the people, would enable us to abolish the tariff and make this great land smile with peace and plenty. With highways universally and permanently maintained, the postal service extended to every hill and dale and made to embrace the carriage of parcels and express; with systematic extension of the aid to agricultural demonstration and experiment; our schools endowed and equipped; institutions for the treatment of our ill and infirm and for the extension of knowledge, and for relief and instruction upon all questions involving social and physical well-being established and maintained; with all this possible if we can devise a procedure which will save us from this staggering martial waste, how can this national competition in armament be justified?

When we build a Dreadnought, have supplied its armament, and made it ready for battle, we shall have to spend over $10,000,000; and to keep it on the sea, properly manned, will cost annually about a million dollars. The distinguished Senator from Maine, Mr. Hale, an expert in these matters, said in a speech in the Senate on May 20, 1910 (RECORD, p. 6594):

That every battleship of the Dreadnought class that we built cost, when fully completed and equipped and ready for war, from $16,000,000 to $18,000,000—

And that he had given the matter minute investigation.

In a decade, after we have spent some $30,000,000 on its construction and maintenance, it becomes a second-class ship, and in 10 more years it is relegated to the third class, and soon thereafter becomes practically useless. The great battleships of 1900 are now in the second or third class, and in a few years more will be more valuable to demonstrate their uselessness, their mistakes in design, their wasted cost, and as junk than for use in war. All of the millions expended will have been swallowed up like the Titanic in the remorseless sea. The great guns placed upon these vessels thunder forth their futility. A hundred shots—and they belch greater danger to our brave gunners and the ship than to the enemy.

We have a great Nation, and claim to be a Christian Nation, and to stand for peace on earth and good will to all. We have the greatest resources of any nation in the world. God has led us from over seas to a land separated from probable aggression by thousands of miles of water. We should stand for peace and good will on earth and employ our industry and our resources in the arts of peace.

Mr. President, we want no sailor settled like an "old man of the sea" on the back of every man who must then labor not only for himself and his family but for his costly rider. What nation would measure swords with us or invade our shores even if we had no battleships?

Our duty and responsibility is plain. We must maintain a Navy reasonably adequate to police our shores and our dependencies. We must by world treaties secure to the Philippines immunity from seizure and attack, open them to the enlightenment and development of all nations, and extend our weary protectorate until such time as the gradual civilization of the waste places of the earth has reached those islands and made their people fit for self-government. For these purposes we need no annual multiplication of vessels of war nor dollar diplomats. We need a State Department with the love of humanity for its guide and the example and conviction of a great people to back stand it.

Instead of harkening to the romantic visions of great conquests, I desire to submit to the Senate that we should not only set all nations an example by limiting this evergrowing waste for armament and appeal to the Christian spirit of the world, but should hold such inducement as we can to bring an end to this orgy of expenditure for war. With every farmer in Germany burdened with the equivalent of maintenance of six nonproducing men at arms, with England in social chaos from her great outlay, let the United States, in determining its tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, prescribe a differential against the ships of every nation which constructs more than one battleship of the first class a year.

Mr. President, let us take the first step toward the redemption of modern times from socialism and anarchy, those grim reflexes of martial waste. Let us add to our example the force of economic expediency. I shall earnestly oppose the construction of more than one battleship, and I will submit to the Panama bill when it shall come before the Senate an amendment embodying my idea of the first step toward international disarmament and which will make the use of the Panama Canal on equal terms with other nations conditional upon a limitation of naval expenditure.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will not be adopted. The provision contained in the bill is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the exception of 1 member, 14 of the 15 members constituting that committee being in favor of it. I have prepared a short statement in regard to the amendment of the committee, which I ask the Secretary to read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, did the Chair lay before the Senate the amendment which I proposed to the amendment of the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been received, and will be laid before the Senate as soon as the time comes for a vote. In the meantime the Senator from California has asked that a statement relative thereto be read. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Your committee has deemed it advisable to recommend the construction of two battleships. The progress of the great nations in naval construction is such as to compel the United States to add yearly to its fleet fighting vessels of the greatest possible efficiency in order not to fall so far behind in offensive and defensive strength as to invite aggressive policies by other countries. The opening of the Panama Canal will be followed by changes in the great trade routes of the world, and the United States, through its ownership and control of the new waterway, will be brought into closer contact with the great world powers than ever before, and the latter will have interests in the Western Hemisphere which do not now exist. The Caribbean Sea will become one of the centers of the world's greatest commercial activity, in which all the great nations will play prominent parts. The concentration of the trade interests of all the great maritime countries at the Isthmus of Panama will necessitate on the part of these countries such action as all nations take to safeguard their commerce, and there will be an incentive for the exhibition of foreign naval and military strength in the waters contiguous to the canal, which has hitherto been lacking. The new interests which other nations will have in the Western Hemisphere on account of the new trade routes established through the Panama Canal will almost surely bring into the field of international discussion as never before the so-called Monroe doctrine, and the United States, as its promulgator and sponsor will doubtless have to deal with questions arising thereunder, some of which may well be such as to render it advisable to have adequate naval strength behind official negotiations. Such naval strength is secured mainly through battleships, the floating force which, when necessity arises, must meet and contend with battleships of a foe. If we are to maintain ourselves upon the sea, our offensive strength must be at least equal to that of any probable antagonist. And it goes without saying that if we do not construct vessels equal in power to those which other nations build, we shall soon become so far inferior as an antagonist upon the sea as to render impotent objections to what, under the Monroe doctrine, might be considered unfriendly acts. M. d'Estournelles de Constant in the report of the Commission of the Interparliamentary Union, in behalf of the limitation of naval and military expenditures, pertinently says:

"Only senseless beings—and whatever may be said, they are rather rare—would make light of the fate of their country, as good citizens profit by modern progress in order to develop their activity, as their independence and dignity grow, the more their sense of duty toward national defense develops; in the same way a father would defend his child, his family, his home."

For the past three or four years the United States has stood next to Great Britain in sea power. To-day she has yielded that place to Germany. Not only in gross tonnage of naval vessels is Germany far ahead—1,087,399 tons against 885,066—but in real fighting strength as represented by battleships.

Built and building, Germany has 726,119 tons of first-class battleships and battleship cruisers against 555,796 tons for the United States. These figures represent 42 German vessels and 35 American. And the building program of Germany goes steadily on, and next year will see a further discrepancy between the sea strength of the two countries if we remit our efforts; but comparison with Japan will reveal in a very striking manner the unwisdom of refusing to add capital vessels to maintain our sea strength. The battleships and battleship cruisers built and building in Japan to-day aggregate only 372,498 tons against 555,796 tons for the United States—21 fighting ships against 35; but at this time Japan has no all-big-gun ships, though six are under construction, yet the program adopted by Japan will place that country on an equality in that respect in 1920, even if we continue the policy of building two battleships a year. In that year the United States would have 24 fighting vessels, 16 battleships armed with 14-inch or larger guns and 8 with 12-inch guns, while Japan would have 23 capital ships, only two of which would carry guns as small as 12 inches. She would have 21 ships carrying guns of 14-inch caliber or over, to pit against only 16 United States vessels of the same class. In calling attention to this state of affairs, the Scientific American says:

"It is surely only necessary to enumerate the facts to impress upon the country the seriousness of the position and the folly of even thinking of reduction."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill, or of the Senator from Massachusetts, if it is a fact that other countries are now engaged in building battleships larger than those contemplated by this bill?

Mr. LODGE. Of course the expression "contemplated by this bill" is rather indefinite. There are some larger ships built and being built by other countries than any we have yet undertaken to construct.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but that is not exactly the question. I desire to know whether the Senator understands that this bill—and I ask for information—would warrant our entering upon the construction, simply under the authority conferred by this bill, of battleships as large as those that are now being constructed by some of the other nations?

Mr. LODGE. This provision would permit the Secretary of the Navy to build battleships as large as those the department decided were of the best type.

Mr. CLAPP. That is what I wanted to appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, it is necessary, I find, to add other amendments to perfect the amendment I have offered. I move to change the word "battleships," in line 3, to "battleship," and in lines 3 and 8 to strike out the word "each" where it occurs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified to the amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 79 it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, in line 3, before the word "first-class," by striking out "two" and inserting "one"; in the same line by striking out "battleships" and inserting "battleship"; and in lines 3 and 8 by striking out the word "each."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts, or the chairman of the committee, how many battleships are now being built and how many have been contracted for that are in process of building at this time?

Mr. PERKINS. There are 29 already constructed and ready for service.

Mr. OVERMAN. I mean how many have been provided for and not yet completed?

Mr. PERKINS. Four are under construction and two have have been authorized.

Mr. OVERMAN. So that six are now under construction?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Six are now under construction.

Mr. OVERMAN. And two more authorized?

Mr. PERKINS. If the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs is adopted by Congress, two more battleships will be authorized.

Mr. OVERMAN. So that if this appropriation is made it will make eight battleships provided for by law but not completed?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we provide for two battleships now, how long will it take to construct them?

Mr. PERKINS. About three years.

Mr. OVERMAN. If they are begun at once; but can they be begun at once when two already provided for are uncontracted for?

Mr. PERKINS. It will be six months before the plans are ready, and it will be two or three years, at least, before they are completed.

Mr. OVERMAN. How about the two that we have not even contracted for which were required to be built?

Mr. PERKINS. They have been referred to the general board of the Navy for the preparation of plans, and so forth, and, as I understand, bids are about to be asked for their construction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BURTON. I call attention to the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	McCumber	Simmons
Bacon	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Bourne	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Curtis	Myers	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Newlands	Smoot
Bryan	Gardner	Overman	Swanson
Burnham	Gronna	Page	Thornton
Burton	Guggenheim	Paynter	Tillman
Catron	Heyburn	Perkins	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Poindexter	Warren
Clapp	Jones	Pomerene	Watson
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Reed	Wetmore
Crane	Kern	Root	Williams
Crawford	Lodge	Sanders	Works

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I rise only to state that I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, not because I am opposed to the program of economy that he speaks for, but because I regard an adequate fleet as an insurance against loss by war. I shall vote against this amendment in the interest of economy.

The Senator stated in his speech, I believe, that for every battleship built by the United States, Germany built one and England two.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I did.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is correct; but if it is intended to draw from that the inference that if we cease our shipbuilding program, Germany and England will cease theirs, I deny the correctness of the inference. The shipbuilding program of Germany and England is, I apprehend, only remotely dependent on our program. Theirs will go on whether we build ships or not, although, perhaps, their programs might be affected remotely by our action.

It is only very recently that we noticed in the public prints statements of the chancelleries of Germany and England of the intentions of those countries in regard to building ships, and we have read the official statement in the House of Commons that——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment—and the notice served upon Germany by England that for every ship laid down by Germany England would lay down two; so that whatever our program may be and whatever contingent difficulties we may have in the enforcement of our foreign policy, we will be confronted by those fleets, regardless of the program which we may adopt here.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if he thinks we can ever equal England in its armament and its fleet? How much money would we have to pay out to do so? Would it not be over $2,000,000,000 if she just stood still?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If we should undertake to do that, Mr. President, we would have to pay out $216,000,000 a year for our naval estimates.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. For 20 years?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, for the present rate of increase or for the present equipment. What period of time would be required to overtake England in armament is a matter dependent, of course, upon various circumstances that can not be calculated here.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. The Senator's idea is not that we can ever accomplish the result of having as large a fleet as England at all, is it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think we ought to have any such object in view. I do not think that it is necessary.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. But if we had the idea, we could not do it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My idea is that if we wanted to do it we could do it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. We could not do it at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We could afford to do it, and there is nothing in the world that I can see and nothing that the Senator has so far pointed out which would prevent this Nation from building a fleet as great as that of England. I do not contend that we ought to do that; that is not involved in this proposition; but I do say, in answer to the Senator's question, that, if the necessity arose for it, we have the wealth, the resources, and the ability to build a fleet equal to that of England.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I think the Senator will admit that England has as great ability and as great resources as we have for building battleships.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I do not admit that at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Well, we differ widely.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The resources incident to the construction of battleships consist of natural resources and accumulated wealth, and I insist that this country has more resources than has the Empire of Great Britain; but that is a mere academic discussion.

We have undertaken to assert, Mr. President, since we have become a nation of importance, what has come to be known as the Monroe doctrine. That doctrine is not accepted as a part of international law by the great nations of Europe. The only way we can maintain it is by the possession of a sufficient military force. For every ship we build we are relieved to that extent of the necessity of maintaining an army.

It is only commonplace to refer to the wars in which we have already been engaged, and to call attention to the fact that we have been successful in those wars, including the great Civil War, because of our Navy. In the great Civil War the Federal Union was successful because it commanded the seas and the Confederate States possessed no navy. So it was in the Revolutionary War. The services of John Paul Jones, together with the services rendered to us by the French fleet, were responsible to a large extent for the success of the American Army and the American Nation in the war for independence. So it has been throughout our history.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to ask the Senator how our Navy in the Revolutionary War compared with the English Navy. We had only a few ships then.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It compared very favorably in point of brilliant service. It compared favorably enough for us to threaten the city of London, to gain victories off the coast of the islands of Great Britain, and to threaten the commerce of England.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will suggest that it was the French fleet in Chesapeake Bay that compelled the surrender of the British forces at Yorktown. If the French fleet had not been in American waters at that time to maintain the naval supremacy of our cause, the results of the Revolutionary War would have been vastly different.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not the slightest doubt of the accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Virginia. But I say it is only commonplace to cite the fact that not only in our own experience, but in that of England itself, and that of all the great nations of the world, their success and their greatness have been due to their navy, to their command of the sea. That was the case with the Empire of Rome. England never would have survived the attacks of Napoleon if it had not been for the superiority of her fleet, the superiority of her admirals, her command of the sea.

We can not blind ourselves to the fact that we are facing the contingency, at least, of foreign difficulty, not only in the Atlantic but in the Pacific. The danger is constantly increasing; the possibility of those difficulties is becoming more acute year by year as the pressure of population and the struggle for existence become more acute in the great nations bordering upon those oceans. We are compelled to be prepared to defend ourselves. The moment we cease to maintain an armament, that moment we become a prey to the necessities and to the ambitions of the nations which rival us upon the Atlantic and upon the Pacific.

We have had practical experience already with Japan and with England and with Germany—I hope the incidents will not be repeated, but they are matters of recent history—when we were able to maintain the honor of the United States, not through diplomacy, not through negotiations, but because our diplomacy was backed up by an adequate fleet. The only way we can continue to maintain the honor of this country, so long as the program of military armament by other nations is continued, is to continue to be able to use force when it is necessary.

I am in favor of peace, as we all are. If the Senator from Alabama could institute a negotiation which would result in the simultaneous cessation of warship building by Japan and Germany and England and the United States, he would render a great service not only to his own country but to mankind. But for the United States to undertake to stop the extension of its Navy, without consideration of what the other nations are going to do, would be, in my judgment, perfect folly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is another phase of this matter which ought to be mentioned. When we provide for the building of two battleships we are merely providing a market for at least $20,000,000 of American material and American labor. If we were going to buy these ships in a foreign market, ships constructed out of foreign material by foreign labor, that would be a different proposition. But we are merely going to make occupation for American citizens by giving them a chance to construct these ships. Nothing is lost in the way of money expended, because it is merely an interchange or an exchange. It is creating an opportunity to do business.

One of the wisest provisions in regard to the construction of these ships is that they must be constructed of home material by home labor, and that goes far to justify the expenditure of these large sums of money. It is not an expenditure in one sense of the word, but it is employing our own resources and making opportunities for men.

I have never hesitated to vote liberal appropriations for the construction of ships for the Navy, not because I thirst for war or strife, but because I regard their construction as a guaranty against war and as a guaranty of protection to our people and their property. The responsibility of founding this Nation rested upon those who did that great act, but the responsibility of maintaining it rests upon each succeeding generation that follows.

There should be no cessation, no period when this Government should not be expending the money which it collects in tolls from foreign peoples and nations to protect us against the aggression of those peoples. We take in every year at our customhouses enough money to build 30 battleships. We make the foreign manufacturers and producers of dutiable articles build our Navy out of only a small portion of the money we collect from them. So my conscience does not trouble me in regard to the expenditure of money for this purpose.

Think how much more desirable it is to keep an enemy out of the country than it is to take care of him after he gets into the country. We do not want foreign soldiers landed upon American soil. When they are once landed we are confronted with a very different proposition. The Navy of the country is, and should be, primarily intended to protect our people against the invasion of foreign foes, and it has always met the necessity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand a vote for the amendment is a vote for one battleship, while a vote against the amendment is a vote for two?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct; at least in the first part of his statement.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Chair have the amendment read, in order that we may see in what form it is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 79, in the proposed committee amendment, it is proposed, before the word "first-class," in line 3, to strike out "two" and insert "one"; also, on the same line, to strike out the word "battleships" and insert the singular, "battleship"; also, on lines 3 and 8, to strike out the word "each," so that, if amended, it will read:

That for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed one first-class battleship, carrying as heavy armor and as powerful armament as any vessel of its class, to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $7,425,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not seeing him on the floor I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], but I am assured that he would vote as I intend to, and, therefore, I take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. FOSTER's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] is necessarily detained from the Chamber on account of sickness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I am also authorized by my colleague to say that, if present, he would vote for two battleships.

Mr. HEYBURN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present, and in his absence I withhold my vote. I will say that if he were present and I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WETMORE (when Mr. LIPPITT's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] is unavoidably absent. He has a general pair, I understand, with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). On this and other matters for the time being I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. It is my information and understanding that if he were here he would vote "nay" on this amendment, while if at liberty to vote I should vote "yea." But, on account of being paired, I refrain from voting.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He favors two battleships; I favor one. He would vote "nay" if present, and I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is unavoidably absent. He has a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber, and I understand he is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I had risen to my feet to say that I voted inadvertently, without noting the absence of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and will allow my vote to stand. I am just informed that the Senator from Nebraska is paired, and under the circumstances I withdraw my vote.

Mr. WARREN. My colleague [Mr. CLARK] is at home ill. He has a general pair, I believe, with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. If the senior Senator from Montana were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CULBERSON. In view of my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bacon	Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Smith, Ariz.
Bristow	Fletcher	Kern	Tillman
Burton	Gronna	Pomerene	Williams

NAYS—43.

Ashurst	Cullom	Lodge	Simmons

So the amendment of Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. I have an amendment to propose. I was on my feet when the question was put, although possibly I did not present the matter quickly enough. I want to propose an amendment to that section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will consider it, if there be no objection.

Mr. ASHURST. I offer the following amendment——

Mr. LODGE. The amendments of the committee have not yet been completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Arizona to say that he wishes to amend the amendment just adopted? That can not be done without a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. ASHURST. I then offer it as an independent amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now considering the committee amendments, and unless it is an amendment to a pending amendment, the Senator will have to withhold it for the present.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; I will do so.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 79, line 11, after the words "navy yards," to insert

"one to be built in a navy yard on the Pacific coast," so as to make the clause read:

Two fuel ships to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $1,140,000 each, and which shall be built in navy yards, one to be built in a navy yard on the Pacific coast.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, line 19, before the word "submarine," to strike out "Four" and insert "Eight"; in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two million two hundred and forty" and insert "four million four hundred and eighty"; in line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight hundred thousand" and insert "one million six hundred thousand"; and in the same line, after the word "purpose," to insert "and the Secretary of the Navy is directed to consider the advisability of stationing four of said submarine torpedo boats at or near the mouth of the Mississippi River and the United States seaports of the Gulf of Mexico as a proper naval defense thereof," so as to make the clause read:

Eight submarine torpedo boats in an amount not exceeding in the aggregate $4,480,000; and the sum of $1,600,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose, and the Secretary of the Navy is directed to consider the advisability of stationing four of said submarine torpedo boats at or near the mouth of the Mississippi River and the United States seaports of the Gulf of Mexico as a proper naval defense thereof.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the section, which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 80, in line 3, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to insert the words "and the other four upon the Pacific coast."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 8, after the words "in this," to strike out "except submarines," and in line 10, after the word "authorized," to strike out "except submarines," so as to make the clause read:

The Secretary of the Navy may build any or all of the vessels authorized in this act in such navy yards as he may designate, and shall build any of the vessels herein authorized in such navy yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels, have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, after line 17, to strike out:

The appropriation made by the act of May 4, 1898, for one gunboat to be built on the Great Lakes and to take the place of the United States ship Michigan (now Wolverine) is hereby made available for the construction of a river gunboat, which may, as advantage may offer, be built elsewhere than on the Great Lakes or their connecting waters.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight million nine hundred and forty-six" and insert "twelve million six hundred and fifty-eight," so as to make the clause read:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and steam machinery of vessels heretofore and herein authorized, $12,658,205.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred and twenty-five" and insert "four hundred and forty-five," so as to make the clause read:

Increase of the Navy; equipment: Toward the completion of equipment outfit of the vessels heretofore and herein authorized, $445,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five million two hundred and sixty-five" and insert "thirteen million one hundred and ninety-three," so as to make the clause read:

Increase of the Navy; armor and armament: Toward the armor and armament for vessels heretofore and herein authorized, $13,193,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 81, line 23, change the total so as to read "$29,799,373.48."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill and read to line 21, page 83, the last paragraph read being as follows:

That every contract hereafter made to which the United States, any Territory, or the District of Columbia is a party, and every such contract made for or on behalf of the United States, or any Territory, or said District, which may require or involve the employment of laborers or mechanics shall contain a provision that no laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by the contract, in the employ of the contractor or any subcontractor contracting for any part of said work contemplated, shall be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day upon such work; and every such contract shall stipulate a penalty for each violation of such provision in such contract of $5 for each laborer or mechanic for every calendar day in which he shall be required or permitted to labor more than eight hours upon said work; and any officer or person designated as inspector of the work to be performed under any such contract, or to aid in enforcing the fulfillment thereof, shall, upon observation or investigation, forthwith report to the proper officer of the United States, or of any Territory, or of the District of Columbia, all violations of the provisions of this act directed to be made in every such contract, together with the name of each laborer or mechanic who has been required or permitted to labor in violation of such stipulation and the day of such violation, and the amount of the penalties imposed according to the stipulation in any such contract shall be directed to be withheld for the use and benefit of the United States, the District of Columbia, or the Territory contracting by the officer or person whose duty it shall be to approve the payment of the moneys due under such contract, whether the violation of the provisions of such contract is by the contractor or any subcontractor. Any contractor or subcontractor aggrieved by the withholding of any penalty as hereinbefore provided shall have the right within six months thereafter to appeal to the head of the department making the contract on behalf of the United States or the Territory, and in the case of a contract made by the District of Columbia to the commissioners thereof, who shall have power to review the action imposing the penalty, and in all such appeals from such final order whereby a contractor or subcontractor may be aggrieved by the imposition of the penalty hereinbefore provided such contractor or subcontractor may within six months after decision by such head of a department or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia file a claim in the Court of Claims, which shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide the matter in like manner as in other cases before said court.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 83, line 22, to strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question in my mind is as to what is agreed to. That section, in part, is as it comes from the House and is not subject to amendment during the consideration of committee amendments, but there are contained in the section several provisions that might be subject to amendment now.

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps the Senator did not notice the amendments by the Senate committee which are included.

Mr. HEYBURN. They are all included in the section; but the question is whether now in considering those very meager amendments we are to be taken as accepting the portions of the bill on pages 82 and 83, in which there are no amendments except one, in which the word "act" is substituted for the word "section."

Mr. LODGE. That is the bill precisely as it passed the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. When?

Mr. LODGE. The eight-hour bill. It is the eight-hour bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that; but we are now considering it as a part of this legislation.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware that it is a part of this bill. I can only say that the committee followed the bill as it passed the Senate. They did not feel that it was possible, after the recent action of the Senate on that bill, to enter on an attempt to change the bill in connection with the naval appropriation bill, and they hope it will be allowed to go without debate on the subject, because we are anxious to pass the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was inquiring, in my mind, as to why it was necessary to reenact the existing law. I would call the Senator's attention to the question as to why it is necessary to enact an existing law in this bill.

Mr. LODGE. It was necessary to enact it because the law as passed does not become effective until after the 1st of January, 1913, and it was desired to make the law effective for the naval work between now and that time. The clause, by an error, was left in the bill on page 85, and of course it will be taken out. It is the clause fixing the date.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I understand it, it amounts to this, that a piece of bad legislation, which, fortunately, was deferred, is now hastened forward in this bill. I thought it was very regrettable that Congress should have enacted that law, and I got some comfort out of the fact that its operation was deferred. Now that little comfort is to be taken away by making it operative a long time before Congress intended it should be operative. I do not care to enter again——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Under the present law, before the passage of what is commonly known as the eight-hour law, the construction of battleships was already under the eight-hour law. The only effect of this provision is to extend the common eight-hour law to subcontractors. The battleships last let were let to contractors under the operation of the eight-hour provision that was placed in the appropriation bill for the Navy. So this is but a limited extension of the present law operating now on this measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I will ask the Senator from Virginia if any harm has come to anybody because of the operation of the eight-hour law under which the battleships have heretofore been built?

Mr. SWANSON. None that I have heard of. The Newport News shipyard contracted to build a ship under the eight-hour law, and I have heard of no dissatisfaction. They have gotten along very nicely.

Mr. GALLINGER. This eight-hour law seems to be of so much importance that we have got to enact it and reenact it and reenact it again.

Mr. SWANSON. The occasion for this provision being included here is that the eight-hour law passed the House and came to the Senate and there was some doubt as to whether it would pass the Senate or not. So it was put in this bill. Then, after it was included in this bill, as the general eight-hour law as passed does not operate until 1913, it was thought that possibly it might repeal the eight-hour law which was carried in the naval appropriation bill of last year and the year previous to that, limiting the work on battleships contracted for to eight hours. Then the eight-hour law was extended to subcontracts under the interpretation. We saw no occasion why the eight-hour law should not be made operative at once on battleships, for the reason that contracts might be made now which would extend over two and three years. If we should have a contract made before the 1st of January, 1913, under the eight-hour law it might extend over two or three years, which time would be taken for the completion of the battleship, and so we thought it better to include the provision in the pending bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me——

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The only comfort I got out of the discussion and the vote upon the eight-hour bill was that on my motion it was not to be operative until January 1, 1913. In other words, it gave contractors of the Government a little time to digest this matter and to prepare themselves for the operation of a law which to my mind is going to do a great deal of harm. But we did get that little bit of comfort out of it. Now, that is a law, and yet at the suggestion of somebody the law is to be reenacted, and that provision is stricken from it.

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is simply to be enacted as to this appropriation bill; that is, to make it apply to battleships the contracts for which are to be made under this bill. It provides for ships to be built years from now, and if they are to enter on contracts between now and the 1st of January, 1913, when the eight-hour law becomes operative, there is doubt as to whether they ought to make contracts under the general eight-hour law or not. To eliminate that difficulty the intention was to let the eight-hour law apply at once to the battleships to be contracted for and to be built under this bill—contracts which will extend over many years.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet the Senator a moment ago admitted that under the eight-hour law there was no trouble about building the battleships which had been provided for.

Mr. SWANSON. There was this conflict: The Attorney General held that the eight-hour law simply applied to work done in the yard, not to contracts and work elsewhere, and the general eight-hour law was passed to get rid of some interpretations of that kind.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, we enacted this law less than a month ago. On June 19, 1912, the act was approved. It provides:

> That all classes of work which have been, are now, or may hereafter be performed by the Government shall, when done by contract, by individuals, firms, or corporations for or on behalf of the United States or any of the Territories or the District of Columbia, be performed in accordance with the terms and provisions of section 1 of this act.

That is the obnoxious provision contained in section 1 of the act. Now it is proposed to repeal the last clause of the act approved June 19, 1912, less than a month ago. It is proposed to repeal that which came into the bill through the amendment, I believe, offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which reads as follows:

> SEC. 3. That this act shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913.

We are proposing, as I said, to repeal that provision of the act so recently enacted. Of course that was considered at the time. There has been no test of the efficiency or applicability of the act. Sufficient time has not elapsed in which anything could occur that would justify a change in the provisions of an act so recently enacted; but we are, in this appropriation bill, proposing to repeal section 3 of that act. I can see no reason why we should do so.

As I said, I shall not go back and enter into a discussion of the merits of the law of June 19, 1912. I only protest against enlarging the scope of what, in my judgment, was not only bad legislation but void legislation, which undertakes to say that a man shall not be allowed to work more than eight hours, that he shall be fined, and that the contractor shall be fined and punished, and that the subcontractor shall be fined and punished if he permits a man to exercise a right that we had always supposed, until this class of freak legislation came in vogue, was one of the inalienable rights of a man.

Mr. President, we ought not to do it. If that law is to remain let it remain subject to the consideration of the next meeting of Congress, which may be wise enough to repeal it between the meeting of Congress and the 1st day of January, 1913. I have thought perhaps there was some ground upon which to base a hope that the further thought upon this question might prompt Congress to repeal that act.

In my judgment, Congress went beyond its powers in saying that a man might not contract for his own time and sell it by the hour or by longer periods or sections. I do not believe it is within the power of Congress to say that a man shall or shall not work, except in the case of a conviction for an infraction of the law in the nature of a punishment. I do not believe that Congress had any more right to say that a man should not work more than eight hours than to say that he should work more than eight hours. I believe that the right of individual contract for the services of the individual is one of those inalienable rights that can not be controlled or disturbed by legislation. Congress thought otherwise—I will not say in its wisdom, but in its hours of inattention and forgetfulness. It seemed to think——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mental aberration.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; mental aberration. It seemed to think that its powers were unlimited over the personal and private affairs of the individual, and thrust this statute upon the statute books. I had hoped that within the short time that has elapsed since the enactment of this law, less than 20 days ago, Congress might have gathered some wisdom and some conservative judgment. I had hoped that it might have done so, but it seems to be still under the mental strain which resulted in that enactment, and is inclined not only to repeat it but to emphasize it.

Can it be possible if this eight-hour law, as it is called, were before Congress to-day, after a conservative consideration of it, a fearless consideration of it, with the national conventions gone by, with no selfish motive for bidding for support, that Congress would reenact that measure? The Senate of the United States has been denominated a conservative body. It has in the past stood against such erratic propositions and the consummation of them by legislation.

Who made this demand that a man should have taken away from him the right to labor? There is a sensational element of the people that claims the power to take away from a man the right not to work. Now, we have reached the point where it is asserted that we have the power to take away from a man the right to work.

I am in thorough sympathy with the right of individual contract, whether it be for 6 hours or for more. It is purely an individual question. We have knowledge of conditions that exist in this country where men work what are termed 8-hour shifts with 20-minute passes. There is a crew of men who go on in the Comstock lode and work 20 minutes and come out and another crew go in and take their place and work 20 minutes. In the aggregate the crew work only 6 hours because of the conditions in those mines—water so hot as to be only bearable, condition of atmosphere that renders it impossible for men to work a continuous shift of 6 hours. But it is a question of contract with them. They are paid for the full shift, notwithstanding that they work only a comparatively small portion of it.

Now, while we are not confronted with the Comstock question here we are confronted with possible conditions where men by their contract with their employers regulate the hours and conditions under which they work. We do not recognize that any longer. We have established the principle, if you may call it one, of regulating in the Chambers of Congress the right of a man to work. We have disregarded the necessity, we have disregarded the benefits of the laborer, we have disregarded his wishes in the matter, and we not only fine the man who does it, but fine those who employ him.

Now, that was bad enough. I am hoping and praying that the conservative wisdom of the people will correct that error, and I am protesting here, not only against continuing it and specifically providing for it in this bill, but hastening the day when its wicked and baneful purpose shall confront the people of this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had already announced that the amendment was agreed to, but withheld the final conclusion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the years and nays on that provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment on page 83, striking out the word "section" in line 22 and inserting the word "act" in lieu thereof. Upon the adoption of that amendment does the Senator from Idaho call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho did not quite mean that. As I understood the Senator, he meant to demand the yeas and nays upon this eight-hour provision as a whole after it had been amended. I think that was his purpose.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the purpose of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will demand the yeas and nays on the section, then.

Mr. HEYBURN. My objection was directed to the eight-hour provision. Whether it is necessary, under parliamentary rules, to submit the entire section or not is one that I have not given consideration to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are a number of amendments in the section, and the votes will have either to be limited to particular amendments as offered or else the vote will be taken, if desired by the Senator, upon the section as finally amended, which would include the particular amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the vote should be taken on the section as a whole as amended. Then, if it is rejected or sustained, it can be dealt with further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator desires to withhold the call for the yeas and nays until the entire section has been dealt with?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. With the Senator's permission, I desire to inquire whether it is his purpose to strike out the eight-hour provision that was enacted some weeks ago as affecting Government construction.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is to strike out the provision which advances the time when the eight-hour law takes effect.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I listened to the explanation made as to why this particular provision was incorporated in the bill, but I did not hear any statement giving the true condition of the attempt to amend the statute.

While the so-called eight-hour bill was pending in the Senate, the friends of this measure in the House, rather out of abundant caution, concluded that it was best to insert that bill bodily in the naval appropriation bill, word for word, as it passed the House. After the naval appropriation bill had passed the House and was pending here the Senate, after having amended the eight-hour bill slightly, passed it. The House on the 5th of June concurred in the Senate amendments, and on the 19th of June the President signed the bill. In the meantime the provision included in the House was permitted to remain in in the Senate; and the Senate amendments to the original bill were incorporated in this bill. So what is pending now is a complete word-for-word copy of the eight-hour law, approved by the President on the 19th of June.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. With this exception, that it does not include a provision that it shall take effect on the 1st of January, 1913. If the matter shall remain in the bill as it now stands it will take effect together with every other provision in the pending bill as soon as it is approved by the President. The effect of it will be to advance the date on which the eight-hour law is to take effect to the date on which the President shall approve the naval appropriation bill.

Those in favor of that change in the law, and for which I have heard no satisfactory explanation, and for which I see no particular reason, will vote to retain the matter in this bill. If it is amended so as to include the provision that it shall not take effect until the 1st of January, 1913, then all the matter on pages 82 and 83 and the following pages might be stricken out, because it is a literal reproduction of existing law, and it would amount to nothing more than an act of folly to reenact it in that form.

By failing to include a provision that it shall take effect on the 1st of January, 1913, we make it operative immediately. That is the issue presented here now. If the proposition of the Senator from Idaho shall be adopted it is not to strike out anything, but to incorporate an amendment that this part of the bill shall not take effect until the 1st of January, 1913. That identical effect can be obtained by striking out the entire eight-hour law from the bill, for it has no place here, if it is going to take effect on the same day that the existing law will become operative, if it has been made to conform literally and absolutely with the law approved the 19th of June.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator that perhaps it could be accomplished by inserting after the word "made," in line 1, page 82, the words "after January 1, 1913."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then that would make it exactly as the law is now and encumber the record with an unnecessary provision.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is in that first line that the difficulty occurs. It is in that first line that the act becomes immediately operative.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The law becomes immediately operative unless we include in it a provision specifically mentioning another date. What the Senator desires to do can be accomplished not by striking out anything but by moving to insert a provision that has been erroneously printed in the bill on page 85, lines 13 and 14. I understand the committee did not authorize the clerk to include the words contained in those two lines as a committee amendment. If that shall be included, then the law in this bill will be exactly the law that is now upon the statute books, and there is no good reason why we should duplicate existing law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas if lines 13 and 14, on page 85, are not found in the amendment proposed by the committee?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understand that that is not true, because if that were true the whole provision ought to go out, as it is a mere duplication of existing law.

Mr. HEYBURN. This print would indicate it.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Lines 13 and 14, page 85, have no place in the bill, and were placed there inadvertently. The Senator from Arkansas is correct as to one proposition, and that is that unless the provision is to take effect at once none of it is necessary.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Of course not.

Mr. CLAPP. It was put in here not to advance the time when the general law should take effect, except as to the matters covered by the bill. As this bill is passed at this time, as contracts may be contemplated at this time, and as possibly work will progress, it was thought that it would avoid confusion by advancing the time at which the eight-hour law takes effect as to these matters to the time of the passage of this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the effect of the use of this verbiage is simply to put the law already passed into effect six months before the time it was intended it should go into effect.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is it.

Mr. CLAPP. As to those matters within this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is mistaken about that. There are no exceptions. It is the incorporation of the general eight-hour law, which applies to all kinds of Government contracts, whether connected with the construction of naval vessels or any of the other works which the Government undertakes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I might state the amendment that I have already written in the bill, it might probably shed some light. I have the bill marked on page 82, after the word "made," in line 1, to insert "after January 1, 1913." That goes to the time of the making of the contract. Then I had it marked to strike out lines 13 and 14, on page 85. I think that would leave the eight-hour law stand only to be operative after January 1, 1913.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is very true; but it can be accomplished in a much more parliamentary way by striking out the entire provision. It has no business there; it is simply a duplication of existing law. If it is not the purpose of the Senate to make the law operative at once, then the thing to do is to strike it all out.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will cheerfully yield to any effort the Senator may make in that direction.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Until we have taken a vote upon the proposition to amend, so that it shall not take effect until the 1st of January, 1913, I shall withhold the motion to strike it all out; but if that amendment be adopted, then there will be no reason why it should be incorporated in this bill, because it is already the law, having been approved, as I understand, on the 19th of June last.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish merely to make a parliamentary inquiry, which is whether or not it will be proper to propose two amendments at the same time, inasmuch as they deal with the same subject; that is, the motion to insert the words "after January 1, 1913," on line 1, page 82, and to strike out? But first, I will propose the amendment on page 82.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is equivalent to providing that the act—defining it—shall take effect at that time. If that shall be done, it will make it an exact copy of existing law, and therefore there will be no reason why it should be included in this bill.

Mr. CLAPP. If I may address myself to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], I will say that it seems to me the proper procedure is to perfect this amendment; and one of the steps toward perfecting it on the request of the committee would be to strike out lines 13 and 14. Then the question would be whether the Senate desired the eight-hour law to take effect as to these matters before the time fixed in the law itself. If it did not, then the simple way would be to strike out the entire amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, through an inadvertence the purposes of the committee have not been carried out in this provision. The purpose of this provision was to have the eight-hour law applicable immediately to contracts under this bill. That is what we desired. The committee intended that the eight-hour law should be operative at once on contracts that were entered into under this naval appropriation bill. We have no purpose of changing our eight-hour law as to the time it should be operative generally. Neither did we have any desire to delay it until the 1st of January, 1913, so as to make it operative as to the appropriations under this bill. A battleship might be contracted for at once, while its construction would extend through two or three years. There might be some constructed under the eight-hour law and some not under the eight-hour law. So it was necessary to make the eight-hour law operative at once as to the provisions of this bill. It was by inadvertence that this was extended to 1913. The proper thing to do is to eliminate from the bill lines 13 and 14, on page 85.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator will permit me, I will, on behalf of the committee, offer that amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. Here is where I want to offer an amendment. I will yield for a moment for the Senator's amendment to be read, if it accomplishes the purpose.

The SECRETARY. On page 85 it is proposed to strike out lines 13 and 14.

Mr. SWANSON. I accept that amendment; but here is another thing that ought to be done.

Mr. CLAPP. Let us have it understood that that amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there are other amendments in that portion of the bill which have not yet been acted upon. The Senate has not yet reached that point of their consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator from Virginia will yield, I should like to inquire——

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield when I have made clear my statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I merely wish to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield in a moment. Having got rid of the delay of this being operative until the 1st of January, 1913——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have not yet got rid of that provision, and I desire to call the Chair's attention to the fact.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to offer to amend the amendment, if the Senator will permit me. I refuse to yield any further now, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho rises to a parliamentary inquiry, which he will state.

Mr. HEYBURN. One amendment is pending. Another amendment is not in order until the amendment pending is disposed of. That amendment is to amend, in line 1, on page 82, by inserting the words "after January 1, 1913," and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a committee amendment; and, unless it is offered as an amendment to the amendment, would not now, under the agreement of the Senate, be in order.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire, on the part of the committee, to correct their amendment striking out lines 13 and 14, on page 85. That perfects the committee amendment. It is for the Senate to determine what they will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit that amendment, although there are other amendments in the previous paragraphs which will have to be returned to, as they have not yet been acted upon.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. GALLINGER. We do not agree to the amendment that the Senator has offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, to carry out the purpose of the committee, on page 82, line 1, I move to amend the provision, so as to read:

That every contract under this bill hereafter made—

And so forth. That would carry out the purpose of the committee, which was to limit the immediate operation of the eight-hour law to contracts made in pursuance of this bill. I would suggest, on page 82, that it read in this way:

That every contract under this bill hereafter made.

Then strike out lines 13 and 14, on page 85. That would carry out the purpose of the committee, and would limit the immediate operation of the eight-hour law to contracts under this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. I have offered the amendment on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia offer an amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. No. My amendment would not be in order, as a committee amendment is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 85 it is proposed to strike out the committee amendment inserting lines 13 and 14, which read as follows:

That this act shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know that I shall oppose striking out those words; but I will appeal to my friend, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], to let the friends of this provision—which is simply reenacting a law which is on the statute books—amend it as they please. Then the Senator can move to strike out the entire provision. We shall have the yeas and nays on that, and while we shall expect to be voted down we shall at least go on record as being opposed to twice passing a law which we think is a bad law. I think that will be the better procedure.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is true.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], striking out lines 13 and 14.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think, in voting on this amendment, we ought to take into consideration the fact that if this law is not so amended that it will go into effect at once all contracts that are let under it will be let without any provision as to an eight-hour day, while all similar contracts that are let after the 1st of January, 1913, will be let subject to the requirement of an eight-hour day under the general law; so that we shall have the condition of some contracts for Government work being under an eight-hour day, while some contracts may be under a 12-hour day or a day of any other number of hours.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment. Let me complete the sentence and then I shall yield.

If this amendment offered on behalf of the committee is not adopted every contract provided for in this bill may be let before the 1st day of January, 1913, and not be limited by the eight-hour day provision at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it would be absolutely limited under existing law to eight hours. The only difference would be that it would not apply to subcontractors. That is about all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is under a misapprehension in regard to that, because the existing law does not go into effect until the 1st day of January, 1913, and the contracts that are made before that date would not be subject to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; we have an eight-hour law on the statute books independently of this eight-hour law. We are just piling eight-hour laws in this country one upon another.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How many are there?

Mr. GALLINGER. This will be the third one, I think.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator is mistaken as to that. There is an eight-hour law applying to Government work done by the Government itself and in the Government navy yards. There was a law passed, which goes into effect on the 1st day of January, 1913, relating to work done by contract. The purpose of this amendment is to extend the operations of the last law to which I have referred to the time of the passage of this act, so as to include the vast amount of work which will be done under this appropriation bill, and to put all the contracts upon the same footing.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask the chairman or some other member of the committee whether the amendment embracing lines 13 and 14 on page 85 has been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] to strike out lines 13 and 14 on page 85. That motion was arrested by the debate, which was continuous. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee, I want to offer an amendment to carry out the purposes we had in view. I am requested by the chairman of the committee to offer an amendment to the text on page 82, line 1, after the word "contract," so that it will read:

That every contract authorized by this act, hereafter made, to which the United States * * * is a party.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 82, line 1, after the word "contract," it is proposed to insert the words "authorized by this act," so that if amended it will read:

That every contract authorized by this act, hereafter made, to which the United States, etc.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not be adopted, because it will produce a most anomalous condition. Here is a long act, covering all kinds of contracts, set out on the face of this bill to accomplish the narrow purpose of extending the provisions of that act, or so much of its provisions as apply to a certain character of contracts. If it is the intention to extend the provisions of that act to contracts made under the authority of this act, a line can do that by a mere reference; but it is not necessary to set out the entire act. The whole eight-hour act would become operative, I take it, as to the naval appropriation bill if there were inserted a provision that it shall take effect at the time of the approval of the bill. The method proposed is a clumsy way to do it, and does not accomplish what we are trying to do.

The distinct proposition submitted here is as to whether or not the eight-hour law shall take effect upon the approval of the naval appropriation bill or whether it shall take effect on the 1st of January, 1913. If it is determined by the Senate that it shall take effect at once, then there is no use of emasculating the eight-hour law by assuming that it shall not hereafter apply to any other contracts except such as are made under the authority of this act. The intention of the eight-hour law is that it shall apply to all contracts; but this, being the last expression of the legislative branch of the Government, would limit the operation of the eight-hour law to such contracts as are made under the authority of this act. The provision in this bill is word for word the eight-hour act, and would, by implication, repeal the other one and make this the law henceforth.

The thing to do is to determine whether or not the Senate desires that the eight-hour law shall take effect immediately upon the approval of the naval appropriation bill, or whether it shall take effect on the 1st day of January, 1913; and it would involve only a simple process to determine that fact. If it is the intention to bring all contracts made under the authority of the naval appropriation act under the operation of the eight-hour law before it would take effect ordinarily, which will be on the 1st of January, 1913, a simple sentence would do that; and it would not be necessary to amend the entire eight-hour law, as this amendment will do, and limit its scope to such contracts as are authorized by this act. The provision in this bill is a permanent law, and will take the place of the other.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. CLAPP. I understood the Senator to say that his understanding was that if the language in the bill were changed so that it limited the provision to contracts provided for in this act, because it recited in terms an existing law and made it applicable only to those matters covered by this act, it would repeal the existing law.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Oh, yes; it will take the place of the other law.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator can not mean that.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is what it says; and I can only know exactly what it means by what it says.

Mr. CLAPP. As amended by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], it reads "every contract authorized by this act hereafter made," and so forth. There is a law to-day which provides for the eight-hour day to take effect on the 1st day of January, 1913. Now, the Senate passes a bill to-day relating to specific work, and states in the bill that every contract hereafter made authorized by this bill shall be subject to the general law, reciting the existing law.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. But the Senator is reciting something that nobody has recited.

Mr. CLAPP. Clearly the Senator does not mean that that would operate to repeal that general law which is now on the statute book beyond repealing it pro tanto as to the time it takes effect as to the matters provided for in this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do insist on it, and I insist on it very earnestly, because it is a fact. The language of the law is now:

That every contract—

Without any limitation as to this act or any other act—hereafter made to which the United States, any Territory, or the District of Columbia is a party—shall be covered by certain provisions which are set out. Now you insert—it does not make any difference on what particular piece of paper you insert them—words of limitation, "that every contract made under the authority of this act," and so forth, and then go on to set out at considerable length the procedure by which it is to be made operative and fix certain penalties. When you do that I do insist, because it is a fact, that you pass a new law. You take up the existing law word for word; you cover the whole subject; and it is a well-recognized canon in the construction of statutes that when the same subject matter is taken up and dealt with comprehensively all laws which are in conflict with it are repealed.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Gladly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the mistake comes, if I may use the expression, from the declaration of the Senator that the provision referred to in this bill covers everything covered by the existing law. The existing law applies to all contracts to which the Government is a party direct or through subcontractors. That is the existing law; but now we enact by this bill a law that, as to certain contracts specified in this bill—simply reciting the law again—shall apply at once. I can not think that the Senator means to insist——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir; that is what I do mean to insist upon——

Mr. CLAPP. That in reenacting this law——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is exactly what I want you to understand me as meaning.

Mr. CLAPP. That in reenacting the existing law as to certain contracts——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It excludes from it every contract not mentioned.

Mr. CLAPP. It repeals it as to these contracts to which this enactment does not relate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is exactly what I say; that is exactly what I mean; and that is what I want the Senate to understand me as meaning. It does not make any difference because it occupies a place in an appropriation bill. Suppose an independent bill were introduced here to amend the act to provide for an eight-hour law and it should go on and recite that it should only apply to such contracts as were authorized in the naval appropriation bill. It is text law, about which there is no dispute, that thereafter the act amended or the act dealt with would pass out of existence, and the law upon the subject would be covered by the last expression of the legislature on that subject. The effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia is to limit the character of contracts under the contractual power of the Government covered by the eight-hour law.

Mr. CLAPP. The general law is to take effect immediately as to certain specific contracts.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If you intend that, then why not simply say that the contracts made under the authority of this act shall be included within the terms of the act, giving the title of it, approved on June 19, 1912, and you have done all that you desire?

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senators may settle that matter for themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would simply like to know why the necessity exists for putting all this controversy in the bill?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. There is no reason for it on earth that I can see.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Whether it is to be interpreted as the Senator from Arkansas contends or as the Senator from Minnesota contends, it is a repetition, and does, it seems to me, unnecessarily place the present statute in an anomalous condition. Why should that be done? Where does the public interest require that we repeat this statute in this bill when the general law on the subject will go into effect on the 1st day of next January?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator's question answers itself.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then why not strike out the provision?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I can make a suggestion that will accomplish all that is desired on both sides.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very well; I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is this: If we were to provide that the law approved June 19, 1912, should be in force as to all contracts made under this act from and after its passage, we would cover the matter.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. And all this other matter should be stricken out as tending simply to confuse the situation.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I agree absolutely with the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think I have a motion pending to strike out this provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], on behalf of the committee, to insert certain words in the first line on page 82.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not understand that the committee insist on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Virginia to offer the amendment because he said that he did so on behalf of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think, if I am correct, that the Senator from Virginia and those who are cooperating with him withdrew that amendment, and I think they agreed among themselves to that effect. At any rate, I so understood.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my suggestion is—and I submit it in deference to those who are in charge of the bill—that we strike out all contained on pages 82, 83, and 84 down to and including line 12, on page 85, and insert the following:

That the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 19, 1912, shall be in force as to all contracts made under this act from and after its passage.

Mr. LODGE. That covers it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] on behalf of the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] covers it more accurately and in better terms; and, speaking for myself as a member of the committee, I should be glad to accept his amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, the Senator from Virginia withdraws his amendment and I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. I think I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Virginia can not transfer the floor to another Senator for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I have been holding the floor, and it is taken away from me.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been holding the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia withdraw the amendment which he offered on behalf of the committee?

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to confer with members of the committee before I agree to do so. [A pause.] On behalf of the committee, as it is a committee amendment, I should like to substitute for my amendment the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On behalf of the committee?

Mr. SWANSON. On behalf of the committee. The members of the committee authorize me to do that. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa carries out the purpose of the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator from Virginia had an amendment pending and withdrew it. He can not turn over either the time or the floor to anyone else to offer another amendment. I had risen and had the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment, and I think I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. As I understand, the committee has preference in the offering of amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order adopted by the Senate in the consideration of the bill the committee amendments were to be first considered. The Chair entertained the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia only because the Senator said he offered it on behalf of the committee. He now proposes, on behalf of the committee, to modify that amendment by substituting therefor another amendment, which he offers for the committee. So it is still a committee amendment, but the Senator from Idaho has the floor to speak to that amendment if he desires to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, I have already spoken to the whole provision. It is new doctrine to me, and I have perhaps not kept pace with the parliamentary proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Idaho indulge the Chair a moment until the amendment in its present shape may be stated to the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. Whose amendment is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee; otherwise it would not now be entertained.

Mr. HEYBURN. What member of the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], a member of the committee, who says that he speaks for the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it authorized by the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia says that he offers the amendment as representing the committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Chair for a moment, it amounts to this, that, notwithstanding the declaration which I made that I intended to offer an amendment to strike out this provision, a member of the committee—and there are a good many of them in the Senate—offers an amendment. Members of the committee have no preference over any other Senator in offering amendments. An amendment to a committee amendment may be offered by any Member of the Senate. There is no precedence at all in behalf of a member of the committee. I desire to have the action of the Senate upon my motion to strike out the entire provision. If this matter is to be passed around in a play of battledore and shuttlecock from one Member to another, each adopting the other's amendment in order to let them keep possession of the floor, then, of course, there is nothing for any other Senator, except a member of the committee, to do in regard to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that after the committee amendments have been acted upon he will certainly have full opportunity and right to offer any amendment he sees proper to offer.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I wanted action first on the motion to strike out the entire provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will pardon the Chair a moment, the Senator from Idaho insists upon his right to a vote upon the motion to strike out. There are two objections to that. One is that the friends of the amendment have a right to perfect it before the motion to strike out is entertained. The second is that it would be necessary, under the order of the Senate, to have the amendments of the committee first acted upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I fully realize that rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. I was about to inquire if there are not certain other amendments in the text of the bill which have not been acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they ought first to be acted upon, and then, unquestionably, the committee would have the right to offer the amendment suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has called attention to the fact that certain amendments have not been acted upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the amendments be taken up in order. I think there will be no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the amendments may be taken up in their order, and after that, if it so desires, the committee may offer further amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee can offer any amendments it chooses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment, then, is on page 84, beginning in line 2. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 84, lines 2, 3, and 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "or for the purchase of supplies by the Government, whether manufactured to conform to particular specifications or not," and to insert the words "or to the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods or overflows on the navigable waters of the United States," so as to make it read:

That nothing in this act shall apply to contracts for transportation by land or water, or for the transmission of intelligence, or for such materials or articles as may usually be bought in open market, except armor and armor plate, whether made to conform to particular specifications or not, or to the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods or overflows on the navigable waters of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. That amendment makes this part of the bill exactly conform to the law that was passed June 19, 1912; so there is no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, line 15, after the word "imminent," to insert "and until January 1, 1915, as to any contract or contracts entered into in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal"; in line 19, after the words "due to any," to insert "extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture, or to any"; in line 24, after the words "have been," to strike out "justifiable" and insert "excusable"; in line 25, after the word "this," to strike out "section" and insert "act"; and, on page 85, line 6, after the date, "eighteen hundred and ninety-two," to strike out "or to apply to work done under contracts made prior to the passage of this act" and insert "as modified by the acts of Congress approved February 27, 1906, and June 30, 1906, or apply to contracts which have been or may be entered into under the provisions of appropriation acts approved prior to the passage of this act," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That all classes of work which have been, are now, or may hereafter be performed by the Government shall, when done by contract, by individuals, firms, or corporations for or on behalf of the United States or any of the Territories or the District of Columbia, be performed in accordance with the terms and provisions of this act. The President, by Executive order, may waive the provisions and stipulations in this act as to any specific contract or contracts during time of war or a time when war is imminent and until January 1, 1915, as to any contract or contracts entered into in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal. No penalties shall be imposed for any violation of such provision in such contract due to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture, or to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or to property, or by other extraordinary event or condition on account of which the President shall subsequently declare the violation to have been excusable. Nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify the act entitled "An act relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia," being chapter 352 of the laws of the Fifty-second Congress, approved August 1, 1892, as modified by the acts of Congress approved February 27, 1906, and June 30, 1906, or apply to contracts which have been or may be entered into under the provisions of appropriation acts approved prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment offered on behalf of the committee, to strike out all of pages 82, 83, and 84, down to and including line 12 on page 85. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of pages 82, 83, and 84, and page 85 down to and including line 12, and insert:

The act entitled "An act limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 19, 1912, shall be in force as to all contracts authorized by this act from and after the passage of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho what is the amendment he proposes, because it might be precluded, and the Chair desires to have it stated. Does the Senator desire to amend the amendment offered by the committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. My attention will now be directed to opposing this amendment. Other amendments having been made, this proposes to strike out everything, including the amendments made, and to insert a new provision which repeals section 3 of the act of June 19, 1912.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that these being two distinct propositions they should be dealt with as separate subjects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was with a view to that matter that the Chair made the inquiry, the Chair's purpose being to say that if the Senator desired to offer any amendment he should do so before the vote was taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the question be first put on striking out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator undoubtedly has a right to that division.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that brings the question to the point where I was considering it and proposing to strike out the section. I now move to strike out the paragraph as amended, following the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire that the question be divided and that the Senate act upon the motion to strike out the entire matter as amended. If the Senate strikes it out, it will be time enough then to consider the question as to whether we shall offer a substitute for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire calls for a division of the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Does that involve two questions? I do not understand that there is any motion to strike out separate and apart from the motion to insert. The motion is to strike out and insert. I do not understand that the mover desires to strike out unless the words he proposes shall be inserted. One is dependent upon the other.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I will move to amend the motion so that it will read that the words commencing with line 1, page 82, going down to and including line 12, page 85, shall be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending motion is to strike out the several pages mentioned and to insert the proposed amendment in lieu thereof. Upon that the Senator from New Hampshire asks for a division of the question.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I have asked to amend the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, it is practically the same thing; the only difference is that the vote will be taken first on the motion to strike out and afterwards, if the motion to strike out prevails, the question will recur upon the remaining part of the amendment, which is to insert other matter in lieu thereof.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is immaterial to me which way it is approached, so it is accomplished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was wrong in the statement just made. Rule XVIII provides that a motion to strike out and insert can not be divided.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator made a motion to strike out and insert. Should not that be voted on prior to a motion simply to strike out, as it is perfecting the text?

It would seem to me that the motion to strike out and insert, which is a motion tending to perfect the text, should be voted on prior to the motion simply to strike out which was submitted by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. I moved to amend the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SWANSON. But the Senator's motion was a direct motion to strike out the paragraph entirely. My motion, or, rather, that of the Senator from Iowa, was to strike out and insert, which is to substitute the text in that amendment for the original text contained in the bill, which is to perfect the amendment before it is struck out. I have not examined it carefully, but it would seem to me that a motion to strike out and insert should be voted on before a mere motion to strike out.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Hampshire expressed some surprise when I said a motion to strike out and insert could not be divided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule XVIII prescribes that it can not be divided.

Mr. LODGE. I want to call his attention to the fact that the rule says that—if the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided.

I do not know what Mr. Frye's ruling may have been, but I know what the rule of the Senate is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already recognized the fact that it made an error in stating otherwise in the beginning.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will read the conclusion of that rule and turn to the precedents of the Senate, I think he will find that a very distinguished presiding officer decided that these were two separate motions:

Pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

I am not particular about it, however, Mr. President. I think the rule is a little vague, and we may as well vote on it as a whole and decide it in that way.

Mr. HEYBURN. It will accomplish the same purpose, but it will take one more vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the entire rule read to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Rule XVIII of the standing rules of the Senate is as follows:

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert. But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was with that part of the rule in view that the Chair asked the Senator from Idaho what was his purpose, in order that he might not be precluded. The Chair did not know what the Senator intended by his amendment, which was not clearly in the minds of some Senators, as it is in the nature of an amendment to the part proposed to be stricken out.

The Chair will state to the Senator that under its construction of the rule, if the motion to strike out and insert should be rejected, the Senator would still have the right, under the rule, to move separately to strike out.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had that matter in view—as to whether or not, with the motion to strike out and insert adopted, I would have a right to move an amendment until we come into the Senate. That is the difficulty that confronted me.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho sought to amend the amendment proposed by myself by the suggestion that part of the motion to insert be eliminated and that it remain a motion simply to strike out. I take it, under the ruling of the Chair, that such a motion as that would not be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would be in conflict with the express provision of the rule, although not put exactly in the same shape.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to strike out and insert, which, under Rule XVIII, is not divisible.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend that by substituting this language for the language that the Senator from Virginia proposes to insert:

That this provision shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment to the part which it is proposed to insert.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that is the same amendment which was already pending. A motion is now made to strike out. The amendment which I offered was to the part proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hold that both the amendments proposed can be entertained as to the matter which it is proposed to strike out, although the Chair believes that has been already adopted.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is entirely satisfactory to me. It accomplishes the same purpose I had in view. It is immaterial to me which of the amendments is adopted. I therefore withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report to the Senate the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the language proposed to be inserted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will send it to the desk, Mr. President.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Virginia it is proposed to insert the following words:

That this provision shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment offered by the Senator as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is simply to continue the existing law. If the amendment I have offered, which was prepared by the Senator from Iowa, is voted down, then the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will prevail anyway. That is the general law now. This is simply an effort to make the law operative with regard to the contracts made under this bill.

This bill provides for battleships that will be two or three years in course of construction. There was an uncertainty as to whether or not the law made before the 1st of January, 1913, known as the eight-hour law, could be enforced on contracts made prior to that time. To make it clear and to let the new battleships provided in this bill be built under the eight-hour law this provision was put in. Its effect will be to let the eight-hour law continue as it is with regard to all contracts of all kinds until 1913, except as to the provisions of the naval bill. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa would make the eight-hour law operative at once as to the contracts and the work to be done under the naval bill.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire simply applies the general law that at present exists to the naval bill. If our amendment is voted down—that is, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa—it means that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire prevails. I think a point of order would lie against it, as it is existing law to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not existing law, Mr. President, until January 1, 1913.

Mr. LODGE. No point of order would lie.

Mr. HEYBURN. I simply want to correct the impression that it is existing law. It is not existing law.

Mr. SWANSON. It simply declares what is existing law—that the eight-hour law, as far as it affects contracts under this bill, shall be operative on the 1st of January, 1913. That is the present law that has been passed by the House and Senate and signed by the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will change my proposed amendment so as to amend the amendment of the Senator from Virginia by striking out "authorized by this act from and after its passage" and inserting "shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment as offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the part of the amendment of the Senator from Virginia which proposes to insert certain words by striking from the words proposed to be inserted the following:

Authorized by this act from and after its passage—

And inserting in lieu thereof—

shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia on behalf of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to make simply a single observation in regard to that. A moment ago the Senator from Washington took issue with me as to the law that was on the statute books before the act of June 19, 1912, was approved, in reference to the eight-hour question. The Senator thought there was not any law that limited labor to eight hours.

Now, I want to read just a paragraph from the act of August 1, 1892:

That the service and employment of all laborers and mechanics who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States, by the District of Columbia, or by any contractor or subcontractor upon any of the public works of the United States or of the said District of Columbia is hereby limited and restricted to eight hours in any one calendar day, and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia or any such contractor or subcontractor whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control the services of such laborers or mechanics to require or permit any such laborer or mechanic to work more than eight hours in any calendar day except in case of extraordinary emergency.

The fine in this case was not placed upon the individual laborer, as it is in the act of June 19, 1912, but upon the contractor.

In the act of June, 1912, as I recall it, there is a fine of $5 for each employee who is permitted to work over eight hours a day either by the contractor or the subcontractor, while in the act of 1892 there is a fine "not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction thereof," that fine running against the contractor.

When the act of June 19, 1912, was under consideration it occurred to me that there was not any necessity for that legislation, and there was not, except as it goes into refinement on certain points, and makes it all the more difficult for contractors who are doing work for the Government to do that work in a comfortable way.

Mr. President, we have the anomaly of this act of August 1, 1892, and on top of that we have the act of June 19, 1912, and in this bill it was seriously contemplated to place on top of both those acts another act, which is identical in phraseology, except as to the period when it becomes operative, so that we would have had three acts relating to the eight-hour question covering substantially the same ground.

It has seemed to me that in this class of legislation, under influences that are well known—and I do not question their propriety—we were running rather wild, and I do know that we have already legislated in such a way that it is costing the Government 30 or 40 per cent more for the construction of battleships than it would if the contractor or subcontractor had been allowed to do his work for the Government as they are doing their work for private individuals and against which, in my judgment, there never was any sound or proper objection.

Now, as I remarked a moment ago—and I am not going to occupy any time in this discussion, because I think I know what the result will be—when the act of June 19, 1912, was under consideration we had a long discussion, a good-natured discussion. There were wide differences of opinion on the part of Senators, and on my motion the time was extended until January 1, 1913, to give the men who are now taking contracts from the Government a little breathing space to adjust their work to the new conditions; and there did not seem to be any objection to it. But lo and behold, almost before the ink is dry on the statute, on an appropriation bill comes a proposition to repeal that provision of law and to make the act operative at once.

Under the terms of the bill as it came here from the Committee on Naval Affairs it was beyond a question a general provision. It was a repeal of an act that we passed less than one month ago. Now it is proposed—and that is an improvement—to make it applicable only to work upon ships that are provided for in this bill.

I am glad that that concession has been made, but I do not think that this ought to be done. I think the act we passed less than a month ago ought to be allowed to stand as it is, and that in due time—and it will not be very long—it will be determined by experience whether or not it is a good law, and then we can, if need be, take it up for serious consideration later on. But notifying, as we did on the 19th day of June, 1912, the men who are taking contracts from the Government that they were to have this short time in which to adjust their business conditions, we rush in here two weeks afterwards and undertake to pass—and I suppose we will pass it—a bill that practically repeals that provision of that act.

I regret that it is so, Mr. President, but I am content to record my vote against the provision, which I shall have an opportunity to do.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the act of August 1, 1892, and the act of June 19, 1912.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The acts referred to are as follows:

An act relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the service and employment of all laborers and mechanics who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States, by the District of Columbia, or by any contractor or subcontractor upon any of the public works of the United States or of the said District of Columbia, is hereby limited and restricted to eight hours in any one calendar day, and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia, or any such contractor or subcontractor, whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control the services of such laborers or mechanics to require or permit any such laborer or mechanic to work more than eight hours in any calendar day except in case of extraordinary emergency.

SEC. 2. That any officer or agent of the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or any contractor or subcontractor, whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control any laborer or mechanic employed upon any of the public works of the United States or of the District of Columbia who shall intentionally violate any provision of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each and every offense shall upon conviction be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction thereof.

SEC. 3. The provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to in any manner apply to or affect contractors or subcontractors, or to limit the hours of daily service of laborers or mechanics engaged upon the public works of the United States or of the District of Columbia for which contracts have been entered into prior to the passage of this act.

Approved, August 1, 1892.

An act limiting the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon work done for the United States, or for any Territory, or for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That every contract hereafter made to which the United States, any Territory, or the District of Columbia is a party, and every such contract made for or on behalf of the United States, or any Territory, or said District, which may require or involve the employment of laborers or mechanics shall contain a provision that no laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by the contract, in the employ of the contractor or any subcontractor contracting for any part of said work contemplated, shall be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day upon such work; and every such contract shall stipulate a penalty for each violation of such provision in such contract of $5 for each laborer or mechanic for every calendar day in which he shall be required or permitted to labor more than eight hours upon said work; and any officer or person designated as inspector of the work to be performed under any such contract, or to aid in enforcing the fulfillment thereof, shall, upon observation or investigation, forthwith report to the proper officer of the United States, or of any Territory, or of the District of Columbia, all violations of the provisions of this act directed to be made in every such contract, together with the name of each laborer or mechanic who has been required or permitted to labor in violation of such stipulation and the day of such violation, and the amount of the penalties imposed according to the stipulation in any such contract shall be directed to be withheld for the use and benefit of the United States, the District of Columbia, or the Territory contracting by the officer or person whose duty it shall be to approve the payment of the moneys due under such contract, whether the violation of the provisions of such contract is by the contractor or any subcontractor. Any contractor or subcontractor aggrieved by the withholding of any penalty as hereinbefore provided shall have the right within six months thereafter to appeal to the head of the department making the contract on behalf of the United States or the Territory, and in the case of a contract made by the District of Columbia to the commissioners thereof, who shall have power to review the action imposing the penalty, and in all such appeals from such final order whereby a contractor or subcontractor may be aggrieved by the imposition of the penalty hereinbefore provided, such contractor or subcontractor may within six months after decision by such head of a department or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia file a claim in the Court of Claims, which shall have jurisdiction to hear and decide the matter in like manner as in other cases before said court.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act shall apply to contracts for transportation by land or water, or for the transmission of intelligence, or for the purchase of supplies by the Government, whether manufactured to conform to particular specifications or not, or for such materials or articles as may usually be bought in open market, except armor and armor plate, whether made to conform to particular specifications or not, or to the construction or repair of levees or revetments necessary for protection against floods or overflows on the navigable waters of the United States: Provided, That all classes of work which have been, are now, or may hereafter be performed by the Government shall, when done by contract, by individuals, firms, or corporations for or on behalf of the United States or any of the Territories or the District of Columbia, be performed in accordance with the terms and provisions of section 1 of this act. The President, by Executive order, may waive the provisions and stipulations in this act as to any specific contract or contracts during time of war or a time when war is imminent, and until January 1, 1915, as to any contract or contracts entered into in connection with the construction of the Isthmian Canal. No penalties shall be imposed for any violation of such provision in such contract due to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture, or to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or to property, or by other extraordinary event or condition on account of which the President shall subsequently declare the violation to have been excusable. Nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify the act entitled "An act relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia," being chapter 352 of the laws of the Fifty-second Congress, approved August 1, 1892, as modified by the acts of Congress approved February 27, 1906, and June 30, 1906, or apply to contracts which have been or may be entered into under the provisions of appropriation acts approved prior to the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That this act shall become effective and be in force on and after January 1, 1913.

Approved, June 19, 1912.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will not be content with recording my vote against it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will have to be.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I do not have to be content. I submit, but I am not content. I do not feel like conceding at this time—before the vote—that protest is useless. I have great confidence in the Senate of the United States. When I am satisfied that a question is right or wrong, I am always ready to give my judgment upon it, based upon my estimate of the Senate of the United States.

I do not see that this amendment improves conditions any. I believe I first interposed an objection to the legislation under consideration here because it repealed the third section of the act passed within 23 or 24 days, and which is not yet a law. It will become a law effective on the 1st of January. It is the promise of a law. Congress could repeal it between now and then if it saw fit, or the Supreme Court may hold, as I think it will hold, that it is absolutely void, that we have no such power as is undertaken to be conferred by this act.

I sincerely hope that some industrious man will work more than eight hours, and that he will be arrested and fined, and that he will appeal to the court for a decision as to whether or not he has any control over a contract for his personal service. I sincerely hope that the court will be called upon, before this act becomes effective, to determine that question.

I also hope that when Congress has gone through the turmoil of the coming election, and when the inclination to deal in sensational legislation may possibly not be so strong, it will come back here and repeal it, because if you would submit it to the working people—I do not mean the men who hold offices in labor organizations, but the people who really work—they would repeal it. It might be well if it could be submitted under the rule of the referendum.

But, Mr. President, I would not like to have it said or thought that I ever so far forgot or was tempted to disregard the right of the citizen as to accede to such a proposition as that contained here, simply because we are going to add probably three or four or five million dollars to the cost of our battleships for which we are just providing.

Mr. GALLINGER. More than that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; the Senator on my left says more than that. But we are talking about economy and we are cheeseparing, and quibbling, and trifling over these matters under the pretense of economy. We will sit here and vote for a provision that will add 25 or 30 per cent to the cost of these battleships. How does that appeal to Senators who are opposing the building of battleships because they cost money? It is a question of stop and look and listen; and that admonition might well be posted in plain view upon the walls of this Chamber when we have such sensational legislation, legislation that originates in the ingenious minds of those who are engaged in farming labor, making their living off of laboring men without performing any services or giving any equivalent therefor. Some day the laboring men will rise up and rend those barnacles from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wish to say only one word on account of the apparent difference of opinion between the Senator from New Hampshire and myself to which he has called attention, as to whether we are simply repeating legislation on the same subject. I do not care to go at any length whatever into that question. The Senator from New Hampshire has mastered one great profession, that of medicine, and I must compliment him on having demonstrated from long experience as a legislator that he is a pretty good lawyer also.

A mere glance at the two acts which I hold in my hand, the act of August 1, 1892, and the act of June 19, 1912, shows that they do not cover the same ground. Of course it is perfectly evident that the pending provision does not cover the same ground. Neither one of the provisions does. They relate to different periods of time and simply extend the application of the act of 1912 to a period and to work which otherwise it would not cover.

The act of August 1, 1892, in the language which determines its scope, relates to the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia. The exact meaning of that, of course, is not definite, but it probably applies to works which are being constructed by the United States and by the District of Columbia, and would not apply to the construction of ships in private shipyards under a contract with the Government of the United States.

That is all I have to say in that connection. Of course it is not necessary here to go into the great question raised by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] as to the advisability of the regulation by the Government of the hours of labor. That is a legal, constitutional, and moral question, involving wise considerations of public policy. The legality of it, which the Senator, with his independent mind, attacks, I understand, has been long established by the courts.

As to the cost of the construction of battleships by reason of this provision in the law, it is only a short time since when I was talking with an engineer in charge of a great work, upon which a great many laborers were employed, working under the 8-hour law, and he told me that they got more work and better work out of their men under the 8-hour-day provision than they did when they worked 10 hours a day.

Even supposing that it should increase the cost of battleships, the effect of it would be simply to distribute the cost. It would affect the class of people who bear the cost of the battleships and take a part of the burden at least from the laboring men who put their labor into the ships and place that portion of it upon the rest of the community. That would be the effect of it, supposing that it does increase the cost; but I do not think it ought to increase the cost.

The Senator argues upon the basis that the wages of labor upon battleships would be the same for an 8-hour day that they are for a 10-hour day or a 12-hour day, or whatever the present labor day may consist of. If that is the case, of course they get the benefit of the change. If they do 8 hours of work, and it is true as it is asserted by men competent to judge that the 8 hours of work produce a greater result than 10 or 12 hours of work in the long run, there is no loss to anybody and no increase of cost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee to strike out the several pages indicated and insert the matter which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, after line 14, to strike out:

That no part of the appropriations authorized by this act shall be expended for the pay of enlisted men or seamen, not including commissioned and warrant officers, while doing repair work belonging to any recognized trade, on battleships of the Navy, when such battleships are docked or laid up at any navy yard for repairs: Provided further, That this provision shall not apply to such ordinary duties as are engaged in by the crew while at sea, except the dismantling and assembling of armament for the purpose of repairs.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am opposed to the adoption of this amendment, and I favor this part of the bill as it came from the House. This provision was originally proposed in the House by Mr. MURRAY, of Massachusetts. I ask permission to have read at the desk and incorporated in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the International Association of Machinists, in which very cogent reasons are set forth why this committee amendment should not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have it read?

Mr. ASHURST. I will ask unanimous consent that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will, without objection, read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 13, 1912.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In view of the fact that the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate has decided to strike out the proviso on page 85, lines 15 to 23, inclusive, in the naval appropriation bill, as a representative of organized labor I desire to briefly touch upon a few reasons why this paragraph should remain in the bill and why it deserves your support. The aim of the paragraph is to prevent enlisted men or seamen from being used to encroach upon the sphere of civilian occupations in the repair work on vessels of the Navy at our navy yards.

During the year 1906 the Navy Department adopted the policy of using, as far as possible, enlisted men to do the work of mechanics in repairs on naval vessels, but, with the exception of repairs done on the battleship Missouri in October, 1906, this policy was not enforced to any great extent until March, 1911, when it was again tried at some of our principal navy yards. As a result of this policy hundreds of skilled mechanics have been discharged, and the process of elimination is still going on.

Hundreds of letters have been sent to Congressmen and Senators asking them to intercede with the department to have this practice stopped, but the department thus far has been unwilling to relent, their principal plea being economy.

The reasons we have for opposing the use of enlisted men in place of mechanics are as follows:

1. It subjects the civilian employee, who usually has a family to support, to unfair competition.

2. All trades and occupations have a recognized scale of wages which labor insists upon receiving.

3. Organized labor practices what it preaches in that respect, since it does not expect anyone to lower their standard of living while doing its work. It always pays the prevailing union scale of wages.

4. This practice has a tendency to demoralize the Navy, since men do not enlist for the purpose of becoming workmen and compete against their fellow citizens. It is reported that many desertions have accompanied this practice, besides poor repair work being done.

The laboring people have consistently stood against all kinds of unfair competition. Our main reason for opposing oriental labor and convict labor is because it is cheap. They do not have to maintain our standards of living or citizenship because they are outside of the social pressure which forces us to do so.

We have favored the limitation of child labor not only for the welfare of the child, but also because the employers of labor have taken advantage of the defenselessness of the child and its freedom from the responsibility to maintain our social standards which enables it to work cheaply, and have thus driven adult labor from the field.

* * * * * * *

We believe that ship building and ship repairing should be left to civilians, and that the activities of the enlisted man should be confined to such duties as are likely to arise at sea with the environments of the sea.

It is claimed by some that the repairing done by enlisted men is necessary to secure his efficiency when at sea. This reason is, however, not advanced by the Secretary of the Navy in his last annual report (see p. 6 of report) for having the enlisted men do repair work formerly done by mechanics. The only consideration there given is economy. The practice that an enlisted man would get while repairing a vessel at a navy yard would not fit him to do the same things at sea where the facilities of the navy yard are absent, and where only such things could be done as do not require extensive equipment. His practice for emergencies at sea must be on the sea and not in the navy yard.

It is not necessary for every enlisted man, on the one hand, to be proficient as a machinist, carpenter, electrician, boiler maker, etc., and, on the other hand, to have the strategical knowledge possessed by the commander of the fleet, in order to be proficient as a member of the crew. In an article written by Commander Leigh Parner, United States Navy, appearing in the Scientific American December 9, 1911, he speaks of the duties of a gun crew, but no reference is made to their mechanical qualifications.

The paragraph herein referred to I believe is not more drastic than is necessary to correct the evils which have grown up under this new venture of the Navy Department, since it does not prevent the crew from performing any of its ordinary functions or duties. The paragraph simply prevents them from being used as workmen on repairs while vessels are in dock. From our point of view the paragraph could be further strengthened by inserting after the word "battleships," in line 18, page 85, the words "or other vessels," and after the word "battleships," in line 19, the words "or vessels."

If the verbiage is regarded as covering unnecessary ground, which might in some unforeseen way hamper the functions of the Navy, there would be no objection on our part to have such changes made as to make it workable, provided such changes do not destroy its purpose.

While a letter is not the best medium through which to present an argument, I trust that the few suggestions herein briefly made will enable you to understand our point of view, and that you will see the justice of our contention.

I trust that the paragraph above referred to will not be stricken from the bill in the Senate.

Very respectfully, yours,

N. P. ALIFAS,
President District No. 44,
International Association of Machinists.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to say one word in regard to the action of the committee. There is no intention, and never has been any intention, on the part of the department to have any work done by enlisted men which ought properly to be done by the mechanical force employed in the different yards. I have had a great deal of complaint from the great yard at Boston in regard to the use of enlisted men, and I am desirous, if there is anything wrong in that direction, to have it remedied. But this clause as it came from the House is so drastic that it would prevent anything being done on the ship of the most trifling character if it happened to be in a navy yard. It says, "Repair work belonging to any recognized trade." They could not put in an electric lamp, they could not do anything, under the provision as it stands.

It is true that a ship's company to-day is not composed of seamen alone. At least 50 per cent of it is mechanical, and necessarily mechanical, men who have to make repairs while the ship is in foreign ports and when the ship is at sea. It is most essential that those men should be properly trained in caring for the machinery and all the intricate arrangement which they have to care for when the ship is on the high seas and when she is in a foreign port.

Mr. President, it was the view of the committee that this clause as it stood was too extreme and too drastically worded, and they thought the best thing to do was to strike it out and take it into conference and there frame with the House conferees a proper clause which would prevent, if any such action was needed, the undue employment of enlisted men to perform anything which ought to be done by the mechanical force at the yard, and make the law serve the purpose which it is intended to serve in a reasonable way, and not make it impossible to take care of the ship when she happens to be in one of our own navy yards.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts in order to discover whether I understand this paragraph or not. There is nothing in the paragraph as it came from the House that would prevent an enlisted man from doing the work suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, is there?

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean the slight repairs?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Most certainly there is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not so read it. It seems to me that it is simply a prohibition against paying them anything for it.

Mr. LODGE. That is the way of getting at it. It is to deprive the enlisted man of his pay if he does any work. That is the only way of getting at it. It does not mean to pay him for that work; it is to deprive him of the pay which he has under the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. LODGE. He is paid nothing for doing it now.

Mr. CUMMINS. It reads:

That no part of the appropriations authorized by this act shall be expended for the pay of enlisted men or seamen, not including commissioned and warrant officers, while doing repair work belonging to any recognized trade on battleships of the Navy when such battleships are docked or laid up at any navy yard for repairs,

Mr. LODGE. It would stop their pay.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Massachusetts would not contend that if an enlisted man spent five minutes repairing an electric light the Government would be compelled to deduct from his pay a proportional amount for the five minutes in which he was so engaged?

Mr. LODGE. The mere fact that he performed any work of that sort would stop his pay.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that is a reasonable construction of the paragraph.

Mr. LODGE. It would stop his pay while doing the repair work. Where does the Senator draw the line?

Mr. CUMMINS. What it means is that if he shall enter into general repair work, instead of work that he was employed to do, then his pay should cease; but I can not believe that it would be construed to cover the little things which every man must do about any sort of structure and which do not require any considerable time or any considerable skill.

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps my illustration was unfortunate. Suppose, for example, it was a question affecting shafts. Accidents happen to shafts on steamships all the time at sea, and they have to be repaired then and there, both on merchant marine and naval ships. Suppose some such ship comes into the navy yard with some repair of that sort. It may take a day. It would be repaired, as a matter of course, when men are at sea or in a foreign port. Their pay would be stopped if they had to do that work—there is not any doubt about it—under that clause.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, I think the paragraph provides for the very case suggested by the Senator. I read:

Provided further, That this provision shall not apply to such ordinary duties as are engaged in by the crew while at sea, except the dismantling and assembling of armament for the purpose of repairs.

Mr. LODGE. What I refer to are not ordinary duties.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say they are things done by seamen ordinarily.

Mr. LODGE. They are not done by seamen; they are done by engineers. In all the cases I referred to the seamen do not do this work at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, if the paragraph bears the construction put upon it by the Senator from Massachusetts, his criticism is just, but I do not think it bears that construction.

Mr. LODGE. If there is a doubt about it, as there is in the Senator's mind and mine, certainly it ought to be framed so as to leave no doubt on that point. I think it could be arranged in conference with the House conferees, who framed the clause, without any reasonable trouble.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Secretary to read the construction placed upon the provision by the Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the paper sent to the desk by the Senator from California.

The Secretary read as follows:

The naval appropriation bill as passed by the House contains a provision, page 71, lines 6 to 14, as stated in the amendment on page 7732 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, reading as follows:

"That no part of the appropriation authorized by this act shall be expended for the pay of enlisted men or seamen, not including commission and warrant officers, while doing repair work belonging to any recognized trade on battleships of the Navy when such battleships are docked or laid up at any navy yard for repairs: Provided further, That this provision shall not apply to such ordinary duties as are engaged in by the crew while at sea excepting dismantling and assembling armament for the purpose of repairs."

It is inconceivable that the Government can deliberately contemplate depriving itself even in part of the skill and services of its trained enlisted personnel.

The men of the Navy, from the very nature of their calling, are a combination of skilled mechanic and fighting man. The ships upon which these men are serving are intricate mechanical devices—filled with costly machinery that demands constant care and adjustment.

The necessity for battle training and target practice has been recognized; equally imperative is the necessity for the uninterrupted pursuit of mechanical training—the unhampered, unrestricted right, without question or quibble of law, to do the work that falls to the lot of the enlisted carpenter, machinist, boilermaker, or coppersmith.

It is not always possible for the work incident to repair and upkeep of a vessel of the Navy to proceed in an orderly and deliberate fashion—the demands of the service, the honor of the country, frequently call for the exercise of the utmost speed; the concentration of the greatest number of trained men upon the work in hand.

To dock, clean, and paint a ship is as much an evolution as to coal and provision her. The number of men in any community capable of doing this work is limited. The ship has at least 500 men that can be instantly thrown into this important work—trained civilian employees can not be obtained in such numbers on an emergency; thus without the assistance of the ship's crew a vessel may be detained in dock for several days at a time when her presence afloat is most imperative.

I feel convinced that the effects of this legislation will be so pernicious and destructive in its results as to seriously jeopardize the efficiency and readiness of the American Navy.

I urge that the entire amendment be stricken from the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I wish to say, in addition to the statement just read at the desk, that on the battleship Kansas there are 856 enlisted men, and, with the officers and marines, there are about a thousand souls. Of the enlisted men there are detailed to the engine room 256 and 10 officers. A large percentage of them are enlisted as engineers or mechanics. They get from two to three times the pay of the bluejackets, the sailorman. As all Senators understand, there are machines, such as dynamos for the generation of electricity, hoisting engines for hoisting the anchors, and so forth, for sanitary and many other purposes on shipboard. To say that enlisted men shall not repair them seems to me a travesty upon their duty. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not prevail and that the committee's recommendation will be sustained.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have no doubt that there are some difficulties and wrongs at navy yards because of recent rulings by the Secretary of the Navy as to the work done that ought to be corrected. A battleship comes in for repairs and stays at a navy yard for some time. Mechanics are connected with the yard and perhaps have worked there for a long time; but their only means of subsistence is denied them when a great part of the repair work is done by the seamen. To a large extent such a practice is injurious to the force the department keeps at the navy yards. There has been an uncertainty in recent years as to the amount of work that they shall have; there is no clear line of demarcation as to what work seamen shall do and what work mechanics employed in the navy yards shall do. In recent years there has been uncertainty in that respect.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that there ought to be some law passed that will, without affecting the efficiency of the Navy and of the enlisted mechanics who go out to sea to take care of a ship and repair it, provide at the same time some line of demarcation as to division of work between the enlisted seamen and the employees in the navy yards. Expert mechanics may have been employed in a navy yard for years. They have given their life to the work. A ship may come in, the repairs on which will require the services of 400 or 500 seamen to do work which has heretofore been done by civilian mechanics. Sometimes the work is given them, while on other occasions it is not. That has produced an uncertainty in employment, which is not only unjust to the mechanics in the navy yard, but it also has a tendency to make a great many good mechanics leave that work and seek other employment. I think there ought to be some legislation to eliminate this trouble.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I have here on my desk a book containing several hundred pages of the rules and regulations of the Navy Department, defining the duties of enlisted men as well as the duties of the officers. It seems to me that legislation on our part in this respect would nullify those rules and regulations.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he has ever known of an instance where a ship coming into port has been largely repaired while she was lying at the dock? Is is not a fact always that such repairs as are made under such circumstances are minor repairs?

Mr. SWANSON. The complaint I hear from employees at the Portsmouth Navy Yard is that extensive repairs of late have frequently been made under such circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Virginia refer to the Portsmouth, N. H., Navy Yard?

Mr. SWANSON. I refer to Portsmouth, Va., to the Norfolk Navy Yard.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have had some complaint from Portsmouth, N. H., but an investigation developed the fact that it was not worth considering. The most vehement complaints I have had from Portsmouth, N. H., have been that the men who are confined in the naval prison there, mostly for minor offenses, frequently for reenlisting—that is, the great offense——

Mr. SWANSON. We do not have any trouble of that kind in the Norfolk Navy Yard. They are very good and moral men there. Criminal offenses there do not bother us much.

Mr. GALLINGER. But some of them are sent to the naval prison at Portsmouth, N. H. The most vehement protests have been that those men were permitted to go outside and clean up the yard; that they ought not be permitted to do so; that there ought to be given a chance for outside men to do that sort of work. I think that there have been extreme notions in the minds of our labor friends about those things.

I agree with the Senator that there ought to be some provision inserted in this bill, or in some other bill, that would define exactly what can and what can not be done by the enlisted men; and I will join with the Senator in that, because we do not want to do any wrong to men who are outside. On the other hand, we have enlisted men on our ships who are carpenters, machinists, and electricians, and they have a right to be employed. If a ship comes into port with some minor trouble they might well be permitted to make repairs rather than to send out and get two men to come there, for they never send one; they always send a man and a helper, and the man always forgets a tool and sends the helper back for it. It would cost a great deal to do the little repair work that the men on the ship could do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire are not these men in the employ of the Government when the ship comes into port?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They could not do the work unless they were so employed?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, why should they not do it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they should; they have to do it at sea.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, as I understand, the laboring organizations are almost a unit in favor of the particular clause which is proposed to be stricken out. With a number of them who came to see me I raised the question that has been advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—that it would seem ridiculous that an enlisted man could not adjust a lamp or screw in an electric-light bulb. Their response universally was that that was absurd; that they had not thought of interfering to that degree. They further insisted, as has been suggested, I think, by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that this provision should not apply to such ordinary duties as are performed by the crew at sea; that the Government should be amply protected. It is a fact, as I have gathered from other sources, that in very many instances the present practice has worked harm and is a source of unfairness to organized labor. It seems to me that there can be no harm in adopting the provision as it came from the other House. For one I shall vote against striking out the provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will only say that I hope the amendment proposed by the committee will prevail, because I do not think we ought to be entirely governed in our legislation by the fact that organized labor wants us to do a certain thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, inasmuch as I made the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I want to be distinctly understood about my own position. I am in favor of enlisted men doing in port precisely what they do at sea, but I am not in favor of turning them into general constructors of ships or of their making repairs such as could not be done at sea. If they are mechanics at sea they are also mechanics in port, and they should be permitted to do there what they do when the ship is afloat and what they are really hired to do; but I thought, and I still think, that the provision in the bill does not preclude the enlisted men from doing, when the ship is in port, what they are hired to do and what they do when the ship is on a voyage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out, on page 85, the provision beginning in line 15 and extending to line 23.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On that I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I understood the statement made, I think, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the purpose in striking out this provision is to have it go to conference so that language may be agreed upon which is clearer, which will fully protect the rights of the laboring men, and at the same time preserve a fair condition toward the Government.

Mr. LODGE. That is my purpose.

Mr. REED. And if this is voted out that will be taken care of in conference.

Mr. LODGE. That is my purpose. As I understand, the sole purpose of the committee is to put this provision in proper form.

Mr. REED. I should not like unequivocally to vote this provision out, but with the explanation that the matter will be taken care of in conference and reported back, I will support the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if the committee was not exactly satisfied with this provision, but thought that some such provision ought to be put in, why they did not suggest to the Senate some amendment covering the proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Because they thought it could be done much more expeditiously by arranging it with the committee of the other House which drafted this provision. I think it will only require some slight modification. We could have carried it into conference by striking out one word; but it seemed better to throw the whole question into conference so as to enable the representatives of the other House and of the Senate to agree on the proper language. That is all.

Mr. JONES. The trouble is that by such a procedure most of us are not considered in this matter at all and are not given an opportunity of either rejecting or adopting the proposition one way or the other. If the committee had suggested what they thought was proper language, it seems to me it would have been better. I myself dislike the idea, that seems to be increasing, of simply striking out things and throwing them entirely into conference, leaving them to the consideration of the conference committees, and bringing in propositions as a part of a conference report which we have to take as a whole or reject as a whole.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is not uncommon, I think, in the case of some single item like this, where the Houses are agreed to have some legislation, to leave the wording to the conferees. There is no intention of changing the purpose of this item. The only thing is to get a wording that both Houses shall consider suitable and proper.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but the action of the committee is to strike it out entirely.

Mr. LODGE. In order to bring it before the conferees; that was the purpose; and it is not an unusual thing about a small item of this character, especially where the Senate is told, as it is in this case, exactly what is the purpose of the committee.

Mr. JONES. I know it is not unusual, and that is one thing I complain of. I think it is getting to be a little bit too usual. If this were a question of the principle involved, it would be a different matter; but the two Houses do not differ in the desire to make a proper demarcation between the duties of men at sea and men in the navy yards.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the committee to strike out the lines indicated on page 85, lines 15 to 23, inclusive. Upon that question the Senator from New Jersey has asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I will withdraw the request for the yeas and nays, but I will vote against the amendment on a viva voce vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 86, after line 19, to insert:

That there is hereby established a council of national defense, consisting of the President of the United States, who shall be ex officio president of the council, the Secretary of State, who shall preside in the absence of the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, the Chief of the General Staff of the Army, an officer of the Navy not below the rank of captain to be designated by the Secretary of the Navy, the president of the Army War College, and the president of the Naval War College.

That the chairmen of the several committees of the Senate and House of Representatives herein named shall act as members of the council until their successors have been selected.

That said council shall report to the President for transmission to Congress a general policy of national defense and such recommendation of measures relating thereto as it shall deem necessary and expedient.

That said council shall meet at least once in each calendar year on such date or dates as it shall fix: Provided, That in time of war said council shall meet only upon the call of the President of the United States: Provided further, That special meetings may be called by the president of the council: And provided further, That the council may summon for consultation at any of its meetings any citizen of the United States, and upon request by the council the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall order any officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps to appear before the council for consultation.

That for carrying out the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, to be available until expended, and to be expended upon vouchers signed by the president of the council: Provided, That all necessary expenses of the chairmen of committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, when called to attend meetings of said council when Congress is not in session, and the necessary expenses of all persons summoned shall be paid from this appropriation, upon approval by the president of the council.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is a matter, I am very sure, on which some of us desire light, and I think it will involve some discussion. It is a very hot afternoon——

Mr. LODGE. To what part of the bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. REED. All that part of the bill which we have now reached, which appears in italics, from near the bottom of page 86, including all of pages 87 and 88. It is a matter upon which I should like some light, and I should not like to pass upon it hastily. I think it will involve some discussion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think, Mr. President, this provision has not been estimated for.

Mr. LODGE. No; it has not been.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, I raise the point of order, Mr. President, that, not being estimated for, the amendment is obnoxious to the rule and is new legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been waiting for the amendment to come up to raise that point. It is also general legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order that the amendment proposes general legislation. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the word "Provided," at the bottom of page 85. Possibly, after the action on the preceding amendment, that may be needed. The Chair will inquire if the word "Provided" is intended to be retained?

Mr. LODGE. That proviso applies to the terms of the bill and is part of the existing law. That is a provision put in every naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair referred to the word "Provided," at the beginning of the clause on line 24, page 85.

Mr. LODGE. The word "Provided" can be taken out and the provision stand as a paragraph by itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is all the Chair had reference to.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon. I did not understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the word "Provided," on page 85, line 24, be stricken from the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the amendment on page 32, which was passed over. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, after line 22, the committee reported an amendment to insert:

Depots for coal: To enable the Secretary of the Navy to execute the provisions of section 1552 of the Revised Statutes, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to establish, at such places as he may deem necessary, suitable depots for coal and other fuel for the supply of steamships of war, $500,000: Provided, That $75,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the mining of coal and development work on public lands in Alaska for the purpose of supplying coal for the United States Navy.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out the proviso, beginning in line 4, down to and including line 8, and to insert:

That $75,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the survey, investigation, and report upon coal and coal fields available for the production of coal for the use of the United States Navy or any vessel of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the amendment as reported by the committee reads:

Provided, That $75,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the mining of coal and development work on public lands in Alaska for the purpose of supplying coal for the United States Navy.

Seventy-five thousand dollars would not put the men in the field and clear the brush off the ground. We do not know where the coal is. We have to find the coal first. We must have some kind of a survey, and if we are going to expend $75,000, let us do it for that purpose and not provide for mining coal under a provision that would be utterly futile.

Mr. PERKINS. The Navy Department reported to the committee that they can use the $75,000 to advantage.

Mr. HEYBURN. We want to know what the advantage is. The first advantage to be gained in Alaska is to find out where the coal is; whether it is suitable, and whether it can be made available.

Mr. PERKINS. Where does the Senator propose to amend the amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. On page 33, after the word "dollars" in line 4, as I have written out the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. For how much?

Mr. HEYBURN. The same sum—$75,000.

Mr. ROOT. It is a substitute.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to strike out and insert. I would say that there is no known coal field——

Mr. PERKINS. As far as I can accept it on the part of the committee, I do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, to strike out and insert in the amendment of the committee, as indicated by the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I only want to say in regard to that that the amendment to the amendment destroys the entire amendment. I understand it is to strike out the appropriation altogether.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. LODGE. No; it changes the wording.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So as to make it, instead of developing it, a proposition——

Mr. HEYBURN. Instead of mining coal with this money, it is proposed to use the money for the purpose of ascertaining first whether there is anything to be mined and second whether it can be mined commercially; and it calls for the necessary reports.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We have been investigating the matter for the last 12 years. There are at least a dozen reports of experts on those mines. There are documents published in the Ballinger investigation going into the minutest details of the coal fields.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, it is because of those investigations—and I have sat in committee where that matter has been investigated for weeks—that I offered the amendment. There is in Alaska no known coal that is available to navigable waters. It involves the matter of transportation. I have had put on the wall a map that shows where the coal fields are, and it is utterly futile to talk about mining coal. This amendment as reported by the committee says the money shall be expended for mining coal. Suppose you mine it back from reach of navigable waters, how will you get it there? We want some definite proposition, and it must necessarily include transportation from the mines to vessels.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How many more reports does the Senator think ought to be made? We have had at least a dozen reports, representing that many investigations.

Mr. HEYBURN. This would be a definite report directed to the purpose to be served. The reports that have been made heretofore have not been directed to this purpose at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How is that?

Mr. HEYBURN. The reports that have been made have not been directed to the purpose of ascertaining whether coal was available or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, yes; we have had such reports. I have two of them here.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have those reports.

Mr. POINDEXTER. At this late hour I do not propose to discuss the question, but that question has been examined by competent experts and reported upon at length; and, furthermore, there are a great many men who are perfectly familiar with the ground. Take the Bering River coal fields. The character of that coal has been analyzed and reported upon by experts, and anybody who goes there can see it. It is available to navigable water. It is only 23 miles to a safe harbor.

Mr. HEYBURN. How would you get it over the 23 miles?

Mr. POINDEXTER. By railroad.

Mr. HEYBURN. Who would build the railroad?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Government of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now we have the Government of the United States mining coal and building a railroad to bring it out for $75,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I rise to a point of information. What is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. LODGE. That has been accepted by the committee.

Mr. ROOT. And voted upon.

Mr. LODGE. And voted upon.

Mr. OVERMAN. And voted upon in the affirmative.

Mr. LODGE. The chairman of the committee stated that he had accepted the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, and it was then voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote was taken, but before——

Mr. LODGE. The vote was not announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the result was announced the Senator from Washington addressed the Chair, which he had a right to do. The question now is upon the amendment as amended with the consent of the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I submit the matter upon the statement I have already made, but I feel that there certainly ought to be an end some time to investigation and the beginning of action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole be concurred in?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to reserve the amendment on page 75 with regard to employing an advertising agent to secure recruits for the Navy, in order that I may make a point of order against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the exception of the amendment indicated, then, without objection, the amendments adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole are concurred in.

The Senator from Washington is now in order to make his point of order upon the particular amendment excepted.

Mr. JONES. I make a point of order against the amendment on page 75, as being new legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think that is simply carrying out the general purposes of the recruiting service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be glad to have the Senator state the proposition in detail.

Mr. LODGE. The paragraph provides for recruiting, and this proviso gives authority to advertise for recruits in a particular way. Of course advertising for recruits has to be done. In fact, there is provision of law for doing it. The authorities now advertise for recruits. That is provided for. This simply provides a particular method, allowing them to advertise in a particular way.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think the point of order is well taken. The hour is late, and I do not want to detain the Senate; but I wish to call attention to a condition that formerly existed in regard to advertising for recruits for the Navy.

Some years ago I took an advertisement which I found on a telegraph pole in the city where I live, for the purpose of bringing it to Washington, but I have mislaid it. I think at that time, undoubtedly without the knowledge of the Navy Department, the subordinates engaged in the work of recruiting actually maintained a moving-picture show to which young men had access free of charge, where were exhibited pictures designed to portray in the most alluring manner the life of a sailor, and calculated to lure young men to enlist upon an entirely erroneous supposition as to the real experience in store for them; and I have no doubt this led to a great many of the desertions that occurred in the Navy. Young men were lured to enlistment through these devices, and of course found the real experience entirely different. I do not think the department knew of the practices that were being resorted to, and think they have been largely discontinued. Of course notices of opportunity to enlist have to be given; but I think it well enough to withhold this proposition for advertisement, and believe the point is well taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can only judge by the language of the context. The paragraph is:

Transportation and recruiting, Marine Corps: For transportation of troops, and of applicants for enlistment between recruiting stations and recruit depots or posts, including ferriage and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; toilet kits for issue to recruits upon their first enlistment and the expense of the recruiting service, $317,000.

The proviso is:

Provided, That authority is hereby granted to employ the services of an advertising agent in advertising for recruits under such terms and conditions as are most advantageous to the Government.

The Chair is of opinion that that could be held to be not an enlargement of the law only if it were included in the previous provisions of the section. The addition of it, in the opinion of the Chair, is in the nature of general legislation, enlarging that authority. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, on page 79, line 3, after the word "battleships," the following:

At least one of which shall be constructed in a navy yard of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, which has just been read from the desk.

Mr. LODGE. I think it ought to be stated before that amendment is voted on that that will necessitate a very large increase in the amount of money appropriated for the two battleships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. It costs, I think, from a quarter to a third more to build a battleship in a navy yard than to build it in a private establishment.

Mr. GALLINGER. About 40 per cent more in one instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I now call up the motion I made this morning to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the Indian appropriation bill, House bill 20728.

Before the question is put and a vote taken, I will say that in accordance with the suggestions that were made to me from both sides of the Chamber this morning, I have consulted with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the acting chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I have agreed with him that there are only two amendments that I will ask to have reconsidered.

I ask unanimous consent, instead of putting the motion to a vote, that the vote be reconsidered, solely for the purpose of considering two amendments, one reading:

For continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians of the Flathead Reservation, in Montana, and the unallotted irrigable lands to be disposed of under authority of law, including the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, $400,000.

The other reading:

For continuing the construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in Montana, and the unallotted irrigable lands to be disposed of under authority of law, including the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, $150,000, reimbursable in accordance with the provisions if the act of March 1, 1907.

I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed, solely for the purpose of considering those amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the bill is not here is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the bill is still in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not think the amendments should be changed, but I will not object to a reconsideration in order that we may have a vote upon the matter. However, I think it would be a very serious mistake to open up the question and give them the increase they are asking for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Montana is that, for the purposes indicated, the Senate shall reconsider the votes by which the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read the third time and passed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of H. R. 21969, being Order of Business No. 771, known as the Panama Canal bill. Then I shall ask to have it temporarily laid aside, in order that the unanimous-consent provided for on the calendar for to-morrow's business may be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 21969, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to ask for some information. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, does the consideration of the Lorimer case begin at 12 o'clock to-morrow or after the morning hour?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not care to object, but of course that inquiry is not in order under the motion I have made.

Mr. MYERS. I do not want to interfere with any motion made by the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is a motion pending. As soon as that is acted upon——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SIMMONS. What was the request of the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To proceed to the consideration of the Panama Canal bill, which, if agreed to, would make it the unfinished business. Then it will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I object to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the effect of the Senator's motion is to make it the unfinished business.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. LODGE. Let us have the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 21969.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clapp	Jones	Sanders
Bacon	Crane	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.
Bourne	Crawford	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bradley	Curtis	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Fall	Overman	Stone
Bristow	Gallinger	Page	Townsend
Burnham	Gardner	Penrose	Warren
Burton	Heyburn	Perkins	Works
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Root

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 38 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 6, 1912, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 5, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the spirit which moved our fathers to the high resolves and deeds of heroism which gave us a Government so wise in its conception, so broad in its construction, so lofty in its purpose that it would guarantee to every citizen life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We thank Thee that under Thy providence we have grown in all that tends to make a nation great, but we realize that with every step of progress, every advance in civilization, comes a greater responsibility.

"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Increase our religious fervor and make us vigilant, wise, pure, and inspire us with a holy patriotism that the genius of our Republic may be fulfilled to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, July 3, 1912, was read and approved.

ENCAMPMENT AND MANEUVERS OF ORGANIZED MILITIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House House joint resolution 332, appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers of the Organized Militia, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the following omnibus pension bills, and move to agree to the conference asked by the Senate, which bills I send to the desk and ask to have the Clerk report the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 5623. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 6340. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 6384. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 6851. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 6978. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bills the titles of which have been reported by the Clerk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on these various bills.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi, and Mr. WOOD of New Jersey.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House the papers filed with the bill (H. R. 19746) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to award a first-class life-saving medal to Joseph Donellen, which bill has been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 21259. An act to allow an exchange of certain lands in the Harney National Forest; and

H. R. 24227. An act to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public building acts, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4445. An act concerning unrigged vessels.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, announced the approval of bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On June 28, 1912:

H. J. Res. 299. Joint resolution proposing an international maritime conference; and

H. R. 22204. An act granting a right of way to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co., or such successors or assigns as may be approved by the Secretary of War, across the Fort Mason Military Reservation in California.

On July 1, 1912:

H. J. Res. 331. Joint resolution extending appropriations for the necessary operations of the Government under certain contingencies; and

H. R. 18849. An act for the relief of the Winnebago Indians of Nebraska and Wisconsin.

On July 3, 1912:

H. R. 20480. An act excepting certain lands in Lawrence and Pennington Counties, S. Dak., from the operation of the provisions of section 4 of an act approved June 11, 1906, entitled "An act to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves."

OHIO CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION (H. DOC. NO. 863).

Mr. COX of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have published as a public document a statement relating to the work of the Ohio constitutional convention. I think it is proper to state for the information of the House that since this convention has concluded its work I have had a great many inquiries from Members of the House and the Senate as to the nature of the amendments suggested, and with reference to all of the things that were gone into. I think it would be a very useful public document.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the gentleman's request it is to print as a House document the proposed constitutional amendments submitted by the constitutional convention of Ohio.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I want to be entirely fair with the gentleman, however; that with this is a comprehensive statement made by the president of the convention.

Mr. MANN. That is an official communication?

Mr. COX of Ohio. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would request the gentleman from Ohio to state his request again so the Chair can put it to the House.

Mr. COX of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that there might be published as a House document the constitutional amendments adopted by the constitutional convention in the State of Ohio together with a statement made by the president of that convention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] asks unanimous consent to print as a public document the amendments adopted by the late constitutional convention of Ohio, also with an official statement from the president of that convention. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CANDLER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. LOBECK, for 3 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. GOEKE, for 10 days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS ON FARMERS' NATIONAL COOPERATIVE CREDIT COMMISSION.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, on the 29th of March last I introduced House joint resolution 282, to provide for the appointment of a Farmers' National Cooperative Credit Commission, and on the 29th day of May, at a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture, I made some remarks on that resolution and others pending in the House and the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the remarks that I made before the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject named. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRINTING ARTICLE BY PROF. F. W. TAUSSIG ON WOOL AND WOOLENS (H. DOC. NO. 864.)

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I have here an article by Prof. F. W. Taussig, senior professor of economics in Harvard University, printed in the American Economic Review, on the report of the Tariff Board on wool and woolens. It is a nonpartisan dissection of the tariff report, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] asks unanimous consent to print as a House document an article from Dr. Taussig, professor of economics in Harvard University, on wool and woolens. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as I remember the article—I think I have read it—it is not a partisan article or directed from a partisanship side of the question.

Mr. MCCALL. Not at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As a matter of fact, he does not agree with either that side of the House or this side of the House, if I remember correctly.

Mr. MCCALL. It is a very independent article, and I think a very valuable one; he is a great economic scholar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMERICAN REGISTERS FOR SEAGOING VESSELS, ETC.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for an order that H. R. 16692, a bill to provide American registers for seagoing vessels wherever built and to be engaged only in trade with foreign countries and the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila, and for the importation into the United States free of duty of all materials for the construction and repair of vessels built in the United States, and for other purposes, may be called up as a matter of privilege, not to interfere with appropriation bills, conference reports, or tariff bills.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama please send the bill up?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Alabama to include in his request——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will make the request about the other bill later. I want to get them one at a time.

Mr. MANN. This is a short bill——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill, so the House will understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], chairman of the committee, to explain the purpose of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is not the matter the gentleman sent up the title of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it is a memorandum I had in my hand. It is not the bill; it is merely a memorandum which I had in my hand; the gentleman from Missouri has the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is that H. R. 16692, known as the freeship bill, may be taken up for consideration under the conditions named by him. It is a bill of four sections. The first section provides that American citizens may purchase ships wherever they can buy them the cheapest, and that they may be registered under the American flag to engage in the foreign trade. The second section provides that all material that enters into the construction or repair or equipment of ships may be entered free of duty, and in that regard somewhat amplifying the present tariff law. This bill has been approved by the Department of Commerce and Labor and has the indorsement of the administration and has been recommended by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries for passage.

Mr. MANN. Is this bill unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No, sir. There are two or three gentlemen of the minority of the committee who have united in a minority report.

Mr. MANN. Have those gentlemen been notified or asked about this proposition of setting the bill down for consideration?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this bill is on the Union Calendar. It is an important bill. It is a bill that would justify a rule, if brought in, for its consideration. I merely desire to obviate the time, and my request makes no limitation on debate. It leaves ample opportunity for fair consideration, because it has got to go into the Committee of the Whole House to be fully debated; and it is only a request that, instead of being compelled to bring in a rule to get the bill before the House, we will bring it up by general order in committee.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that it has always been customary that where a request of this sort was submitted to have members on both sides of the committee who are interested informed in regard to the request. What has been done in this case I do not know.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The ranking member of the minority of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], is right here.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I shall object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker——

RADIO COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER. I wish the gentleman would state what the number of the bill is he is about to bring up and on what calendar it is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the second bill that I make the request for is on the House Calendar. It is H. R. 15357, a bill to regulate radio communication, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to take this bill up as a matter of privilege any day following to-day, not to interfere with appropriation bills, conference reports, or tariff bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to make the bill which he has mentioned privileged on any day after to-day, not to interfere with appropriation bills, tariff bills, or conference reports.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman that I have been in conference all the morning with some of the officials of the Government concerning that bill and have another conference for to-morrow morning already agreed upon concerning the same bill. As I understand, there are a number of conferences going on relating to that bill. I have no doubt within the course of a few days there will be no objection whatever to taking it up for consideration. But this morning I am not willing to have it called up, nor to-morrow, if I can prevent it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not asking that it be called up to-morrow, but I would like to call it up one day next week.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that we have reached a place in the House, with appropriation bills in the Senate, where it is necessary to agree on some order of business while waiting for conference reports to come back. I think this bill is of sufficient importance to give it the right of way.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman that some action ought to be taken. A conference in London has been held relating to this matter, which, I think, closed yesterday. I have been endeavoring to obtain information whether that conference agreed upon anything which changed the agreement at the Berlin conference. Nobody on this side of the water yet seems to know. If there has been a change agreed upon in the London conference which ought to be incorporated in this bill, it would not hurt to hold it for a few days until we ascertained whether that is the case or not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman that all the information I have on that subject is through the press of a day or two ago. There was mention made of what had been agreed on. But I will say to the gentleman if he waives his objection that this bill will not be called up until some day next week mutually agreeable to us. I asked Mr. Chamberlain to confer with you that we might come to some understanding about the bill, and I will wait until some day next week until you have had ample opportunity to confer with him.

Mr. MANN. Well, with that understanding, I shall not make any objection. I do not desire to prevent the proper passage of a proper bill——

Mr. ALEXANDER. The administration is very anxious to have something done along this line——

Mr. MANN (continuing). Although I suppose it will be much easier to have a conference with those gentlemen before it is agreed that the bill shall be considered than it will be afterwards.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand objection has been made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] object to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I now understand objection was not made.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does it rest with the gentleman who seeks to make this bill privileged——

Mr. CANNON. Which bill is it?

The SPEAKER. The bill relating to radio communication.

Mr. RODDENBERY (continuing). To have it considered only subject to the prior right of way by appropriation bills, tariff bills, and conference reports? Could not the gentleman include in his request also a request for the consideration of a bill from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization—an immigration bill, making it a measure of privilege along with this, which will tend to make it certain that we shall get up this important measure and consider it at this session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt the bill to which the gentleman refers will be taken up at the proper time. I did not ask for the consideration of tariff bills. I was asking for the consideration of certain bills coming from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. When that request is disposed of there will then be opportunity, if the gentleman who has charge of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization desires to present his request to the House, to ask that his bill be considered. But I do not desire to make the request in his behalf without his presence here.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Well, Mr. Speaker, until there is some understanding relative to that measure, which I regard as paramount, and compared with which I regard this other proposition as trifling, I shall object until the bill I referred to is treated in the same way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] objects.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce that this is private-bill day. In order that we may have a perfect understanding of the matter, the Chair will read the rule. It is as follows:

On Friday of each week, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, it shall be in order to entertain a motion for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar in the following order: On the second and fourth Fridays of each month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims and bills removing political disabilities and bills removing the charge of desertion. On every Friday except the second and fourth Fridays the House shall give preference to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, alternating between the two committees.

The Chair will entertain a motion to resolve the House into Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us adjourn. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that a quorum is not present, and I therefore move that the House stand adjourned.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 6, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. 173) providing for an investigation by the Commissioner of Fisheries as to the destructiveness of the method of fishing known as otter and beam trawling, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 929), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LAFFERTY: A bill (H. R. 25590) to provide soldiers and sailors additional homesteads; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25592) authorizing the construction, maintenance, and operation of a dam or dams across the Current River in Ripley, Carter, and Shannon Counties for the purposes of improving navigation and the development of water power; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 25593) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to terminate the Shawnee Training School, Shawnee, Okla., and to provide reduced allotments to Indians who were allotted lands of no value, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 25594) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NORRIS: A bill (H. R. 25595) providing for presidential primaries; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

By Mr. BROUSSARD: A bill (H. R. 25596) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWN: A bill (H. R. 25597) granting a pension to Ellen Pierce; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 25598) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia Bragg; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL: A bill (H. R. 25599) granting a pension to Edward Lichtenstein; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HARRIS: A bill (H. R. 25600) granting a pension to Stillman S. Perkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 25601) granting an increase of pension to George W. Noah; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25602) granting an increase of pension to Ardell D. Grigsby; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOUSTON: A bill (H. R. 25603) granting an increase of pension to William Green; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LANGHAM: A bill (H. R. 25604) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth N. Brand; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR: A bill (H. R. 25605) for the relief of the heirs of Earl Pate; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PARRAN: A bill (H. R. 25606) for the relief of Samuel B. Gasaway, alias Peter Smith; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25607) for the relief of B. W. Gladden; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 25608) for the relief of Mary E. E. Cheseldine, mother of William Amos Cheseldine, deceased; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RAUCH: A bill (H. R. 25609) for the relief of John Vankirk; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: A bill (H. R. 25610) granting an increase of pension to Levi G. Courtney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 6, 1912.

The Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, without whom not a sparrow falleth, Thou knowest how frail we are, Thou rememberest that we are dust. And it is not because we doubt Thy providence, our Father, that we grieve for the loss of a Member of this Congress, but because our hearts are made lonely, and because we are reminded of the uncertainty of all earthly things. In the midst of life we are in death. But naught can shake our trust in Thee, who art our refuge in distress and a very present help in trouble. Be with those, we pray Thee, to whom this sorrow is most sore. Give unto them beauty for ashes and the oil of joy for the spirit of heaviness. In all things uphold us by Thy spirit and comfort us with Thy presence. And unto Thee, our Father, who hast loved us with an everlasting love and hast called us into Thine eternal kingdom in Christ, be glory and praise on earth and in heaven, now and forevermore. Amen.

Mr. GALLINGER took the chair as President pro tempore under the order of the Senate of June 12, 1912.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR FROM NEVADA.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I present the credentials of Hon. W. A. MASSEY, of Nevada, who has been appointed by the governor of Nevada to fill the vacancy in the Senate caused by the death of Hon. GEORGE S. NIXON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read the credentials of W. A. MASSEY, appointed by the governor of the State of Nevada a Senator from that State to fill until the next meeting of the legislature thereof the vacancy caused by the death of Hon GEORGE S. NIXON June 5, 1912, in the term ending March 3, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed on file.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

S. 4862. An act for the relief of certain persons having supplied labor and materials for the prosecution of the work of constructing the Corbett tunnel of the Shoshone irrigation project;

S. 5935. An act to fix the terms of the District Court for the Western District of Michigan;

S. 6603. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the board of education of New Hanover County, N. C., portion of marine-hospital reservation not needed for marine-hospital purposes;

S. 6946. An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Flathead Indian Reservation to the town of Ronan, State of Montana, for the purposes of a public park and public-school site; and

H. J. Res. 332. Joint resolution appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers for the Organized Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial signed by D. Miller, president of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co., and sundry other presidents of various railroads of the country, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called anti-injunction bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry members of the Ladies of the Maccabees of the World, residents of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation granting to the publications of fraternal associations the privileges of second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Manufacturers and Shippers' Association, of Rockford, Ill., remonstrating against the proposed discontinuance of the Commerce Court, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 997, United Mine Workers of America, of Springfield, Ill., and a petition of Local Union No. 21, United Garment Workers of America, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the passage of the so-called injunction limitation bill, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAYNTER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fayette County, Ky., praying for the enactment of an interstate liquor law to prevent the nullification of State liquor laws by outside dealers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENROSE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of South Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against an appropriation being made to be used for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of peace with England, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the patent laws, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of Local Branch, Pattern Makers' Association, of Quincy, Mass., praying for the passage of the so-called injunction limitation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FORT BERTHOLD INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. CLAPP. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak. I call the attention of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment was, to add a new section to the bill, to be known as section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States shall appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to inspect, classify, appraise, and value all of the lands described in section 1 of this act that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or granted or reserved by the terms of this act, said commission to be constituted as follows: One of the commissioners shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians, one a representative of the Interior Department, and one a resident citizen of the State of North Dakota. That within 20 days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. The said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect and classify and appraise, in 160-acre tracts, all of the remaining lands described in section 1 of this act, except sections 16 and sections 36. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timberland; fifth, mineral land, if any. That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands and necessary expenses, exclusive of subsistence, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; such inspection and classification to be completed within six months from the date of the organization of said commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add a new section to the bill, to be known as section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to inquire whether this bill has gone through the hands of a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has just been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and unanimous consent was given for its consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me that it is a very complicated bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 7262) granting a pension to Overman King; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CATRON:

A bill (S. 7263) to provide for the purchase of a site for the erection of a Federal building at Santa Rosa, N. Mex.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 7264) to indemnify Juan A. Valdez; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 7265) granting a pension to Bertie L. Wade; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the salary of the superintendent of farm and transportation at the United States penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans., from $900 per annum to $1,500 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 25069), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,800 to pay F. H. Wakefield for preparing the history of legislation for the Senate in the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CROW INDIANS OF MONTANA.

Mr. TOWNSEND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 352), which was read and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place in the hands of the Attorney General such papers, records, and other information in reference to the affairs of the Crow Indians of Montana as will enable the Attorney General to investigate such affairs and to bring such action as may be necessary to protect the interests and secure the rights of said Indians; and the Attorney General is hereby authorized to make such investigation and to bring such action, if any, as the investigation may disclose to be necessary.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 351) which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That 20,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 855, Sixty-second Congress, entitled "International Institute of Agriculture," be printed for the use of the Senate document room, and that the notice signed by David Lubin, American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy, be included as a part of said document.

GERARD BRANDON, ADMINISTRATOR, V. THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the dissenting opinion of Judge Howry in the case of Gerard Brandon, administrator, against United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The opinion is as follows:

Court of Claims of the United States.

CONGRESSIONAL, No. 13855–7.

(Decided May 6, 1912.)

GERARD BRANDON, ADMINISTRATOR, V. THE UNITED STATES—ON MOTION FOR REHEARING.

HOWRY, Judge, dissenting:

This cause was regularly transmitted to this court for an investigation and a report of the facts to Congress pursuant to a proper resolution under section 14 of the act of March 3, 1887 (set forth in the margin),[1] commonly known as the Tucker Act. The cause was pending here March 3, 1911, being the time of the approval of the "act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary." This last act did not go into effect until January 1, 1912, and contained a provision that the Court of Claims should have jurisdiction to hear and determine (that is, enter judgment) the claims of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of a previous act approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," and acts amendatory thereof where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds placed in the Treasury, any statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding. On the hearing of a montion to dismiss the present cause for want of jurisdiction to make an investigation and report, the majority of the court sustained the motion on the ground that the remedy given in cases of seizure of abandoned and captured property under the original act mentioned was exclusive; and that the proceeds in the Treasury for captured property are yet held in trust for those who brought suit within the jurisdictional period and established their loyalty and ownership by a decree of this court.

Without hearing any proof or making any investigation whatsoever the majority of the court then proceeded to take jurisdiction of the merits of the present case to the extent of drawing inferences not required by law and conclusions of fact not warranted by the terms of the act referring the bill.

That the claim before the court on which the jurisdiction was thus denied (being alleged to be for cotton taken before June 1, 1865, but taken after the passage of the act providing for the proceeds to be placed in the Treasury) could not be refused an investigation appeared for reasons set forth in an opinion by me dissenting from the action refusing jurisdiction to investigate and make report to Congress, and also dissenting from the majority opinion in denying jurisdiction and yet undertaking to report conclusions without considering the testimony and investigating the facts. My opinion shows that—

1. Where jurisdiction is wanting to find the facts under section 14 of the act of March 3, 1887, jurisdiction is also wanting to report conclusions of law as to the nature of the demand under the amendment of June 25, 1910.

2. The Supreme Court has declared that proceeds of captured cotton under the act of 1863 are a trust for the benefit of such as should establish their claim to it, subject to disposition by Congress, and that the act of 1863 did not intend to confiscate cotton seized under it.

3. Ownership of cotton by the Confederate Government requires a conclusion adverse to the claimant.

4. The grant of jurisdiction by section 162 of the Judicial Code over cotton claims originating after June 1, 1865, does not destroy jurisdiction already existing over claims originating before that date.

5. Jurisdiction to find the facts and jurisdiction to render judgment rest upon separate grants of authority by Congress to this court.

6. Jurisdiction to find the facts under section 14 of the Tucker Act is designed generally for demands outside the jurisdiction of this court to render judgment, but is not inconsistent with such jurisdiction.

7. A right to an appropriation after a finding of facts does not necessarily follow from a finding of facts under section 14 of the Tucker Act.

8. Section 14 of the Tucker Act was designed to remedy deficiencies in the Bowman Act in the jurisdiction to find facts for the relief of Congress.

9. Jurisdiction under section 14 of the Tucker Act over claims for net proceeds in the Treasury under the captured and abandoned property acts has been directly sustained by the opinion of this court in Chieves v. United States (42 C. Cls., 21) and in numerous findings in other cases governing the present case. The cases examined and stated.

10. The act of 1868, declaring the remedy of the act of 1863 in captured and abandoned property claims to be exclusive, related to the then existing power to adjudicate such claims.

11. The exclusiveness of jurisdiction to adjudicate claims under the act of 1863 does not affect the jurisdiction to find the facts under the Tucker Act, passed in 1887.

12. Section 14 of the Tucker Act is not a repeal of the limitation on adjudication in the act of 1863, but a new and general grant of a different jurisdiction, designed to aid the right of petition and relieve Congress from the investigation of facts in private claims.

[1] SEC. 14. That whenever any bill, except for a pension, shall be pending in either House of Congress providing for the payment of a claim against the United States, legal or equitable, or for a grant, gift, or bounty to any person, the House in which such bill is pending may refer the same to the Court of Claims, who shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of the act approved Mar. 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the executive departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," and report to such House the facts in the case and the amount, where the same can be liquidated, including any facts bearing upon the question whether there has been delay or laches in presenting such claim, or applying for such grant, gift, or bounty, and any facts bearing upon the question whether the bar of any statute of limitation should be removed, or which shall be claimed to excuse the claimant for not having resorted to any established legal remedy, together with such conclusions as shall be sufficient to inform Congress of the nature and character of the demand, either as a claim, legal or equitable, or as a gratuity, against the United States and the amount, if any, legally or equitably due from the United States to the claimant.

13. The denial of jurisdiction over claims for proceeds of captured and abandoned property under the act of 1863 is inconsistent with the repeated admission of jurisdiction in other classes of claims for which an exclusive tribunal had been provided before the passage of the Tucker Act in 1887.

14. The judicial code reserves all rights in proceedings pending at its passage, and therefore has no relation to the present case.

15. The test of the power of the court to find the facts is the power granted to either House of Congress to refer the bill.

The new code does not repeal section 14 of the Tucker Act, because there are no words of repeal and none by implication. On the contrary, the section is substantially reenacted in section 151 of the new codified law. Besides, jurisdiction over the cause now under consideration, for the purposes of preserving testimony and reporting the facts to Congress, was retained by section 299 of the new code, which expressly declares that all suits "and proceedings for causes arising or acts done prior to" the time of the taking effect of the new judiciary code "may be commenced and prosecuted within the same time, and with the same effect, as if said repeal or amendments had not been made," and that the new judiciary act "shall not affect any act done or any right accruing or accrued * * * pending at the time of the taking effect" of the new act.

Authorities were cited by the majority to show that the proceeds of captured property now in the Treasury are held in trust for those only who brought suit within the jurisdictional period and established their loyalty and ownership by a decree of the Court of Claims, but that as to all others the title of the United States became absolute. And again, that cotton was a legitimate subject of capture by the national forces.

No one has ever disputed since the Supreme Court passed on the matter that cotton was, from its character, "potentially an auxiliary" of enemy forces and a legitimate subject of capture by national forces. But confiscation of the proceeds of captured cotton was never the intention of Congress in authorizing the seizure of cotton, and the decisions of the Supreme Court have shown that there has been no confiscation of the proceeds of any such property.

Laying aside the case of Ford v. Surget (97 U. S., 594) (cited by the majority) as having nothing to do with the present issue, because that was a suit on the part of the citizen against a Confederate officer for burning the cotton of the citizen, we come to the privileges of all owners of cotton where the proceeds were placed in the Treasury.

In Young v. United States (97 U. S., 62) Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the Supreme Court, said:

"Whoever could bring himself within the terms of the trust might sue the United States and recover, but no one else."

When that opinion was written there was neither a reversal nor an intimation of a reversal of the decisions respecting the effect of a pardon upon the right of any owner to sue for the proceeds of his cotton in the Treasury, except as such an owner's claim and right to recover had become barred by the two years' statute of limitations.

In the case of Armstrong's Foundry (6 Wall., 769) it was held that the general pardon granted relieved the owner from the penalty which such an owner had incurred to the United States. In Ex parte Garland (4 Wall., 380) the Supreme Court held the effect of a pardon to be such "that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense." In United States v. Padelford (9 Wall., 531, 543) the Supreme Court, by a unanimous opinion, answered the suggestion that the property was captured in fact, if not lawfully; and that the proceeds having been paid into the Treasury the petitioner was without remedy in the Court of Claims, unless proof was made that he gave no aid or comfort to the cause hostile to the United States, by saying:

"The suggestion is ingenious, but we do not think it sound. The sufficient answer to it is that after the pardon no offense connected with the rebellion can be imputed. If in other respects the petitioner made the proof which, under the act, entitled him to a decree for the proceeds of his property, the law makes the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he gave no aid or comfort. A different construction would, as it seems to us, defeat the manifest intent of the proclamation and of the act of Congress which authorized it. Under the proclamation and the act the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit, and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own."

In Klein's case (13 Wall., 138) the court, after declaring the intention of Congress and that title to the proceeds of cotton captured and placed in the Treasury was not divested absolutely out of the original owners of the property, said that:

"The property of the original owner is in no case absolutely divested. There is no confiscation."

In Pargoud's case (4 C. Cls. R., 337) the defendants moved to dismiss the case "because it is not stated and set forth in said petition that the claimant has at all times borne true faith and allegiance to the Government of the United States, and that he has not in any way voluntarily aided, abetted, or given encouragement to rebellion against the Government of the United States, as required by the twelfth section of the act of Congress to reorganize the Court of Claims, approved March 3, 1863"; and the court allowed the motion dismissing the case. The Supreme Court reversed that decision (13 Wall., 157), holding that it was unnecessary in a claim in the Court of Claims to prove adhesion or personal pardon for taking part against the United States, as the President's proclamation was unconditional and without reservation.

And in Mrs. Armstrong's case (13 Wall., 154), in alluding to the effect of a previous proclamation granting pardon unconditionally and without reservation, the Supreme Court declared that the proclamation "was a public act of which all courts of the United States are bound to take notice and to which all courts are bound to give effect."

In Haycraft v. United States (22 Wall., 81) the court analyzed Klein's case, without reversing it, by saying:

"If a suit was commenced within two years, a pardoned enemy could recover as well as a loyal friend. But the commencement of the suit within the prescribed time was a condition precedent to the ultimate relief. The right of recovery was made to depend upon the employment of the remedy provided by the act." (Captured and abandoned property act.)

There are other cases which, like Haycraft's case, hold that the pardon came too late for owners of cotton to avail themselves of the remedy. These cases all relate to the remedy and the effect of the statute of limitations in bar of the remedy under the act authorizing this court to render a judgment under the abandoned and captured property act.

In Brent v. Bank of Washington (10 Pet., 617) the Supreme Court, in declining to take that case out of an established rule, said that the act of limitations operated only to bar the remedy, not to extinguish the right, citing with approval Bank v. Donnelly (8 Pet., 361). In affirming the rule the court said:

"The legal remedy is barred, but the debt remains as an unextinguished right."

In Townsend v. Jemison (9 How., 407) the Supreme Court explains the difference between statutes whose effect is to vest title to property by adverse possession and those which merely affect the remedy. The court said:

"The rule in the courts of the United States in respect to pleas of limitation has always been that they strictly affect the remedy and not the merits."

An obligation is distinct from the remedy. The obligation to do a thing is derived either from contract or from the act of the parties.

As applied to personal property, where one has had the peaceable, undisturbed, and open possession for the period which under the law would bar an action for its recovery by the real owner, the weight of authority is in favor of the title of the person as against the neglect of a real owner to avail himself of his legal rights. But before this rule can be applied there must be an assertion of ownership on the part of the person who has acquired possession from the real owner. Before time can vest the right the mere possessor of the property can not plead that he has acquired a good title. He must assert ownership before any lapse of time can divest the right of the real owner. As to the proceeds of cotton in the Treasury, the United States have never asserted ownership, but, on the contrary, have disclaimed title by those subsequent acts of Congress which applied to all cotton seized in enemy States, under which the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to pay on proper proofs.

I have submitted the foregoing observations not because they are strictly applicable to the matter of jurisdiction in the present case, but because the majority of the court have undertaken to make a conclusion (under the act of June 25, 1910) of fact. "The jurisdiction of a court can never depend upon the merits of a case brought before it; but upon its right to hear and decide at all." (Basso v. United States, 40 C. Cls. R., 202.)

An exclusive remedy provided for one owner to have an opportunity to obtain a judgment can hardly be said to be any remedy at all for another owner whose claim can not be considered for the purpose of obtaining judgment because of the statute of limitations. The words "exclusive remedy" operate for the benefit of that class whose cotton was taken after June 1, 1865, and the proceeds placed in the Treasury. But even as to such persons that class may waive whatever right the new statute gives to obtain judgment and yet proceed to have an investigation and report to Congress under section 299 of the new code.

The words "exclusive remedy" relate only to jurisdiction for the purpose strictly of taking a judgment. The investigation and report of a claim have never been considered a remedy until on the report an appropriation is provided by Congress. The mere investigation and report is no remedy at all until Congress gives effect to such an investigation as the basis of a remedy which the legislative power alone may provide at will.

Examine the act authorizing an investigation and report and we find that there must be a bill providing for the payment of a claim against the United States, legal or equitable, for a grant, gift, or bounty to any person, and the reference of such a bill to the Court of Claims. It is passing strange that if, according to the majority of the court, petitioner has no right to an investigation and a report because the statute of limitations is in the way of any opportunity on his part to proceed to judgment on a claim, jurisdiction yet exists for the benefit of any person preferring a claim, whether barred by any statute of limitations or not, or for donations and gifts to be inquired into and reported to Congress. The discrimination against the individual with a claim in favor of one without a claim is utterly inconsistent and indefensible.

If this claimant has money in the Treasury he had, according to the Supreme Court, a right to prefer his demand as a proper claim against the Government within the time allowed by law for prosecuting claims. If barred, he yet had a right under section 14 of the Tucker Act to an investigation and a report, because the statute of limitations only affected the exclusive right given by law to get into the court for the purpose of taking a judgment. But, according to the several decisions of the Supreme Court, the remedy only has been taken away, but the right of the claim is yet unextinguished.

Universal amnesty without restrictions or qualifications of any kind conferred the right on the disloyal by the proclamation of the President of July 4, 1868, to ask of this court judgment for the proceeds of cotton traced to the Treasury. But at the time of the proclamation of 1868 the right to prosecute had become barred by the statute of limitations for those persons who had been unable up to the time of the proclamation to prove loyalty. Though the proclamation came too late to do the disloyal any good for the purpose of obtaining judgment until Congress should remove the bar, they yet had the constitutional right of petition to Congress for relief. That right was as perfect July 4, 1868, as it is now. It can not be taken away even by the legislative body. Still less can this court, or any other court, take away a right of this character because of the fundamental law.

In Ohio Life Insurance Co. v. De Bolt (16 How., 416) the Supreme Court said that "no one legislature can by their own act disarm their successors of any of the powers or rights of sovereignty confided by the people to the legislative body unless they are authorized to do so by the Constitution." Congress may refuse to send cases to this court for investigation, but can not refuse to receive petitions for relief. But Congress have not repealed the act which authorizes the present investigation, whether the demand be for a claim against the United States for or something else less than a claim.

The authority to investigate and report claims by section 14 of the Tucker Act without reference to any statute of limitation was the result of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Ford v. United States (19 C. Cls. R., 519; 116 U. S., 213). When that decision was rendered under the Bowman Act the fourteenth section had no existence. It came into life the next year after the decision in Ford's case was finally made. All that Ford's case did decide was that in 1886 the claim was not within the jurisdiction of this court under the law as it then stood; that is, that it was not within the jurisdiction because of the bar arising from the statute of limitation of six years prescribed by section 1069 of the Revised Statutes. The Supreme Court merely said that it was unreasonable "to suppose that Congress intended to invest one of its branches with authority to suspend a general statute of limitation; that every claim cognizable by the Court of Claims must be determined with reference to the limitation prescribed for claims of the class to which it belongs, unless Congress by statute otherwise directs." Then the court added that reference (under the law as it then stood) would not itself entitle the claimant to a judgment because of the limitation, and that—

"It is undoubtedly within the power of Congress to place claims referred to the court by the Senate or by the House of Representatives on a better footing than other claims by providing that they may be determined upon their merits without reference to lapse of time or any previous bar by limitation."

Nobody ever claimed that this court could render a judgment by virtue of a Tucker Act reference unless the claim had become the subject of suit within the six years' bar prescribed by the other sections of the act of March 3, 1887. But section 14 of this Tucker Act referring a bill requires the court to investigate and report ultimate facts to Congress in all cases, notwithstanding the bar of the period of limitation.

The only lawful course for the court to take by express command of the law is to make investigation, where the claim can be liquidated, to include any fact bearing upon the question whether the bar of any statute of limitation should be removed. The section providing the jurisdiction interprets itself and can not be destroyed by construction. The fact that the majority have undertaken to support their denial of jurisdiction to investigate and make a report to Congress by a Supreme Court decision wholly without application demonstrates the weakness rather than the strength of the position taken in refusing to examine the merits and report the same to Congress. The interpretation given by them only confuses a practice perfectly plain until this cotton claim came along—a practice which the court, as now constituted, aided to establish as final and entirely uniform until now sought to be changed.

The opinion of the majority undertakes to harmonize the purpose and scope of the Tucker Act by the recent amendment to section 14 which requires the court to make an investigation and report to Congress "together with such conclusions as shall be sufficient to inform Congress of the nature and character of the demand, either as a claim, legal or equitable, or as a gratuity, against the United States." If the claim at bar is a gratuity, the jurisdiction is apparent. If it is a claim of a legal or equitable character, the jurisdiction is also clear. If the United States yet have the proceeds of this owner's cotton, the conclusion made by the court as a matter of law or of fact or as a mixed question of law and fact is erroneous, because the statute of limitations has not extinguished the right. If the United States hold the proceeds and to that extent have received a benefit, restitution of the proceeds rests with the Government because of the advantage it did receive and which was never designed to be taken permanently from any owner, except as that owner was shown to be a hostile government. Under the amendment relied on the court is constantly stating to Congress that where a private owner's property has been taken a claim now for its value is equitable because of the benefit originally received by the United States. The "harmony" is too inharmonious to be consistent or to be made to rest upon sound reasons.

Summarizing the objections taken to entertaining jurisdiction, it would appear that the refusal to do so has this effect:

(1) It abridges, as far as this court can abridge, the citizen's constitutional right of petition, because there is practically no other method provided for the investigation of claims barred by limitation except under the fourteenth section of the Tucker Act.

(2) It discriminates against claims (where the United States have received a benefit) in favor of gifts, grants, and bounties.

(3) So much does the refusal discriminate in favor of the investigation of bills providing for donations only, the majority omitted to notice that at the last term the court rendered a unanimous opinion in the case of Atlantic Works (46 C. Cls. R., 60), where it appeared that though it was admitted by the Atlantic Works that the matter before the court was an application for a donation, yet the court decided that jurisdiction must be taken if the resolution transmitting the bill was proper. That case is yet before the court to be investigated with the right stated by the court in its opinion to disclose by findings whether the bill had brought to the court an application for a "donation" or for a "claim" against the United States.

(4) It reverses the Chieves case (42 C. Cls. R., 21) and numerous cases since then, thereby breaking down the principle of stare decisis.

(5) It misconstrues Vincent's case (39 C. Cls. R., 456), because in that case it appeared that a claimant had once had his day in court on an alleged claim under an act then being administered, and where the case had been dismissed because jurisdiction under the act was clearly wanting because of the hostility of an Indian tribe; and also because this court said that jurisdiction would attach had the resolution covered the reference of a bill providing for a gift.

(6) It reverses the action taken in Vincent's case by almost immediately investigating and reporting under the Tucker Act dismissed Indian depredation claims to Congress (in this writer's absence) as "claims."

If anything had been said in argument or intimated from any source that the court should take jurisdiction regardless of the law, I could understand why the case of a negro soldier begging for reinstatement in the Army after his alleged misconduct at Brownsville should be mentioned as authority to prove that jurisdiction is not a matter of sympathy or favor, as was said by the Supreme Court in Reid's case (211 U. S., 539). Later, the occasion may be taken by me to say something further about courts sometimes taking jurisdiction when they should not, but for the present the subject need be no further discussed.

MILL EMPLOYEES AT LAWRENCE, MASS. (S. DOC NO. 890).

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I renew the motion which I made to print the report of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor on the Lawrence strike.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to call the attention of the Senate to that matter at this particular time. As promised the other day, I have secured an estimate of the cost of printing the usual number of the document. If the document is printed with all of the tables, it will cost $3,229.14. If the report only is printed with the tables eliminated, it will cost $1,084.14.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we would like to hear what the Senator is saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appeals to Senators to observe order and refrain from audible conversation. The Senator from Washington renews the motion to have the report of the Commissioner of Labor on the Lawrence strike printed. The Senator from Utah is addressing himself to that motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I was saying that if the report is printed in full, including all the tables, the cost of printing the usual number would be $3,229.14. If the report is printed with the tables eliminated, it will cost $1,084.14.

Mr. President, if it is to be printed, if the Senate so desires, and I think it ought to be printed, I believe that the entire report, with the tables and all, should be printed, and under the cost of $3,229.14 there would be printed 2,127 copies. However, the Senator from Washington did not state whether he wants to have the number divided between the Senate and the House. Does the Senator desire to have it printed for the document room or only for the use of the Senate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think a sufficient number of copies ought to be printed to supply both the House and the Senate. This is a matter which is of importance and interest, relating to one of the pending tariff bills, and I suppose there will be some demand for copies in the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I would suggest to the Senator that the order be made to print it for the use of the document room of the Senate. Then, if the House desire any additional copies, they can take whatever action they wish in the matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That it be printed for the use of the Senate document room?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. Then it becomes a public document, and the House can take whatever action they desire in the matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington.

There being no objection, the order was agreed to and reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the letter of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of May 7, 1912, a report of the investigation by the Bureau of Labor of the condition of the mill workers in Lawrence, Mass., as bearing upon the strike of the textile workers in that city, be printed as a document.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed. The unanimous-consent agreement will be read to the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Saturday, July 6, 1912, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of S. Res. No. 315, declaring that corrupt practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator from Illinois, and that his election was invalid, and that before adjournment on that legislative day a vote be taken upon said resolution and all amendments to and substitutes therefor.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912.

Mr. DILLINGHAM addressed the Senate (see Senate proceedings of July 9). After having spoken for more than an hour and a half, he said:

I am coming to the question of Mr. Stringer's attitude before that legislature. It is a very interesting question, too. I wish there were more Senators present this afternoon to listen to it, because it throws a flood of light on the situation when Mr. LORIMER became a candidate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clapp	Heyburn	Root
Bacon	Clarke, Ark.	Johnston, Ala.	Sanders
Bailey	Crane	Jones	Simmons
Borah	Crawford	Kenyon	Smith, Ariz.
Bourne	Cullom	Lorimer	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Cummins	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Bristow	Dillingham	Myers	Swanson
Brown	Fall	Nelson	Thornton
Bryan	Fletcher	Newlands	Townsend
Burnham	Gallinger	Overman	Warren
Burton	Gardner	Page	Wetmore
Catron	Gronna	Perkins	Williams
Chamberlain	Guggenheim	Pomerene

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. DILLINGHAM resumed his speech (see Senate proceedings of July 9). After having spoken in all 2 hours and 40 minutes, he said:

I intended at this time, Mr. President, to take up, in connection with the subject to which I have just referred, the case of Mr. Beckemeyer and two or three other other parties, whose votes are in question in this case, and examine them in the light of the facts which I have already given; but I have now spoken almost three hours, and I understand the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] desires to speak on the same question, and that he has an address which perhaps will occupy the remainder of the afternoon. So, if the Senate will permit me, I will be glad to resume my remarks on Monday next and yield now to the Senator from North Dakota, unless there is objection. I will say also, Mr. President, that on Monday I will continue my remarks not only in relation to these parties, but also in reference to what seem to me to be other interesting features of this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, not of my own volition do I break in on the lucid argument that is being made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], but the day is warm, and he informed me a short while ago that he would not desire to speak longer this afternoon, but would be pleased if I would take up the rest of the day in a discussion of this subject.

Mr. President, there is no important question that can be considered which does not develop during its discussion some subsidiary question which may become far more important than the principal question. In this case the right of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in the Senate is a most important question, but the question of the right of the Senate to try and retry again and again the right of a Senator to a seat upon substantially the same evidence until by a change in the personnel of the Senate that body may be able to evict him is a far more important question to the country at large than is the right of a single individual Senator to a seat in the Senate. The question whether future contested-election cases in the United States Senate shall be tried upon questions of law and fact and in accordance with well-established legal principles common to the Empire of Great Britain and the United States is more important than the mere question of the right of any single individual to a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. President, the question whether or not these cases are to be tried upon the evidence and in accordance with the law of the case rather than merely conforming to a public sentiment upon a question wherein the public may have erroneous opinions is far more important than the right of any Senator to a seat in this body.

One of the subsidiary questions in the discussion of this case, which, to my mind, has now become a principal question, is whether or not the Constitution of the United States ought to be so amended that the right of a Member to a seat either in the Senate of the United States or in the House of Representatives should be tried by a tribunal made up of other than Members of the respective bodies themselves.

So, Mr. President, before the Senate proceeds to do what to some seems to be a most joyful act—the execution of one of its own Members—I think it proper to enter upon the permanent records of the Senate, very briefly, my reasons for refusing to be a party to this political murder.

Mr. President, the prosecution of Mr. LORIMER was initiated by the greatest blackmailer and criminal yet unhung, Charles A. White. That prosecution has been continued with a spirit of malice unequaled in American journalism, and the culminating act of this tragedy will, in my judgment, be the most tyrannical that ever was inspired by self-aggrandizement or induced by political fear.

I am slow, Mr. President, to change the Constitution of our country. I am still a believer in both the Constitution and our republican form of government. I believe to-day, when public sentiment is more than ever a creature of the great press and when the creation of a biased and morbid ill sentiment seems to be most profitable to that press, that we need the anchor of our old Constitution to keep our ship of state from drifting into the maelstrom of anarchy.

I am not, however, a standpatter for the Constitution whenever standpattism would interpose itself against rational progress. I know that all progress means change, but I also know that all change does not mean progress. I would change the Constitution whenever the changing conditions of the country indicate the wisdom of such an act. I would change it to correct wrongs, but never to create them or invite them. I honor and respect the Constitution, but do not give it a fetish adoration or worship. Experience has shown that some of its provisions should be changed, and the very first change that ought to be made in that venerable instrument is one which should deprive the Senate and the House of the right to determine their own membership, and that should place that question where it properly belongs, with the courts of the country which try cases on law and fact and in conformity with both law and fact.

Whatever may have been our qualifications to sit as jurors in this case when it was first brought before us, I have no hesitancy in declaring that the Senate is to-day so influenced by partisan and factional prejudice and so hampered by political self-interest as to render its Members, as a body, biased and improper jurors.

Suppose, Mr. President, this case were being tried by a court, and the membership of this body constituted the jury panel, and that the court had listened to some of the speeches that had been made in this case by members of that panel, would the court not be compelled to sustain a challenge for bias against the speech makers? Is not justice thwarted when either prosecuting attorneys or defendant's attorneys sit as jurors to pass judgment upon their own pleas; and is not the very temple of justice desecrated and made a shamble when the life or the honor of a man is to be tried by his prosecutors or defenders; and when, if acquitted, he may be brought up and retried again and again, until by a change in the personnel of the jury there shall be more prosecutors than defenders and his destruction thereby assured?

Mr. President, I have served in the Senate 13 years. During that time there has been one impeachment trial and several contests for seats in this body. These cases have demonstrated to me the impropriety of the Senate sitting in judgment on the right of a claimant to a seat. It has demonstrated to me that a body whose membership is necessarily partisan or factional, and from whose decision there is no appeal, ought never to have been given the right to exercise such extraordinary authority.

My experience has further demonstrated that any man whose position here depends upon his conforming his vote to a popular belief or demand created by the press, without any study of the facts, a popular belief which holds one guilty because he is charged with guilt, is not a fair and unprejudiced juror and ought for that reason not only to be excused, but to be forbidden to act in the matter.

I say this without criticism. But, Mr. President, I find just about as much of the human in this Senate Chamber as I find out of it. If to-day any court in the country were trying this Lorimer case with its knowledge of the position which every Senator occupies with relation to his own constituency, with its knowledge that practically the whole country believes Mr. LORIMER guilty, not through any investigation of the testimony, but because for years the whole teaching of the press has been that official life is corrupt, with its knowledge that by casting a vote out of harmony with this general belief, the Senator's own honesty and integrity would be questioned, while a vote in harmony with this belief would add to his popularity—with this knowledge, I repeat, the court would of its own motion refuse to allow any Senator to sit on a jury in the trial of that case. If not implied prejudice at least a suspected influence of fear on the part of the Senator would justify the ruling.

But, outside of this Lorimer case, have I any authority to justify my conclusion as to our being governed by partisan or factional prejudice? Mr. President, we have been so governed in the trial of past cases and we will be so governed in the trial of this Lorimer case.

Mr. President, but a few years ago a Republican judge was tried before the Senate on impeachment charges brought by the House of Representatives. With the exception of two Republican Members of this body, every vote, as I now remember, on over a dozen charges, was a partisan vote. Every Democrat voted guilty and every Republican, but the two mentioned, voted not guilty. There is no use of our saying that these votes were not influenced by party prejudice, party affiliations, or party bias. No sensible person would believe us if we should so state and we would not believe ourselves.

If we needed any further argument to demonstrate the worse than impropriety of the Senate passing on the right of another Senator to remain a Member of this body, the conduct of the Senate in the trial of the Lorimer case would be most conclusive.

In providing that the two Houses should be judge of the right to seats of their own Members, the Constitution contemplated the calm deliberation of men acting in a judicial capacity and not a political prosecution. How far we have strayed from that purpose we all well know. The famished pack in the wake of the fleeing deer could not be more persistent and, I might almost say, more bloodthirsty than has been this prosecution. To my mind it has not been a trial; it has been a persecution in which the desire for popular approval or fear of popular condemnation in many instances has marred our vision and dulled our sense of exact justice.

I have an abiding conviction, a conviction that has grown and strengthened during the time this case has been before the Senate, and I would feel myself lacking in sincerity and candor if I did not so declare, that the desire to win public approval and the ambition to hold official positions dependent upon that approval is the great, powerful, moving influence that guides the thought continuously toward the political guillotine for Senator LORIMER. The public, without evidence, have convicted, hence the judgment of the Senate must carry out that public sentence. I do not charge a desire to punish, but rather a desire to retain or secure a standing which necessitates a victim for punishment.

As I have read the press of the country, as I have listened to the debates in the Senate, the scene of Parrhasius and the captive comes to my mind—where the great painter binds the captive, an old man, to the torture rack, not through malice, not through fiendishness, but that he might sketch the death agony upon the brow, the last quiver of the dying lips, and thereby achieve an undying fame. He heard not the groans of the victim but only the plaudits of the millions yet to be.

In these addresses we hear again the soliloquy of Parrhasius as with keen, artistic eye he studies each convulsive feature as the poisoned links sink deeper into the quivering flesh:

> Pity thee, so I do;
> I pity the dumb beast at the altar;
> But does the robed priest for his pity falter?
> I'd rack thee though I knew
> A thousand lives were perishing in thine,
> What were ten thousand to a fame like mine?

To prevent a vote being had when it was certain that such a vote would result in acquittal, we have seen Senators stand on the floor and talk away the livelong night. We have heard speeches full of invection and every expression emphasized in a voice of passion. And while the perspiration streamed down the cheek, while the hot blood purpled the temples' veins, while the eyes flashed the fire of an inveterate animosity, we have heard Senators, with a voice like the voice in prayer, solemnly declare that this, the Senate of the United States, is the greatest deliberative body in the world. Mr. President, as I have heard this oft-repeated declaration, after one of these exhibitions of factional frenzy, I have been compelled to look into the face of the speaker to ascertain whether back of the outward expression there was not the inward reflection of a grim and ghastly humor.

Let us view this case in the light of public sentiment. The great mass of the people of the country believe Mr. LORIMER is guilty of procuring his election as Senator by the use of money in bribing members of the legislature. They believe it because their minds have so long been poisoned with the idea of corruption in political life that a charge requires no proof to satisfy them of its truth. A great number of them, who do not know each Senator personally, will, if he votes in Mr. LORIMER's favor, believe that his vote was so cast because he does not condemn bribery, and that a Senator who votes to convict does so because he does condemn such methods.

The Senator who believes that Mr. LORIMER is not guilty and so votes, by that very act votes a punishment upon himself. He knows that in performing his duty in accordance with the dictates of conscience and demands of honor he will be assaulted by those who condemn without evidence, or who would use any weapon for a political advantage; and it requires some courage to follow his honest convictions. The Senator who votes against Mr. LORIMER knows that he is making himself more popular by so doing; and this requires, at least, no courage.

Mr. President, I have an abiding belief that if this case were tried by a court or a jury, no jury on the face of the earth would, upon the evidence submitted, ever find Mr. LORIMER guilty of the charges. I go further and say that if this case were tried upon the law and this evidence, by a judge unbiased and unafraid, he would dismiss the action for insufficient evidence to go to a jury. He would first declare the law to be that if Mr. LORIMER had cast for him 102 honest votes—untainted votes—his election is valid, unless he was a party to or had knowledge of bribery or attempted bribery in his behalf. He would then hold that there was no sufficient evidence of participation in or knowledge of bribery or attempted bribery to justify the submission of that question to a jury.

I have a great deal of faith in the American jury system. Upon rumor and without evidence, people will generally believe anyone charged with a crime to be guilty, and this is especially true if the one charged is holding an official position.

But place the case once fairly before them, let them understand it, let them hear the evidence, and their verdict will generally ring true. We have had a demonstration of this in the jury trials had in connection with this very case and with the elections of those charged with having received bribes for voting for Mr. LORIMER. The public, who do not know the facts but only the charges made by a man like Charles A. White, may believe that they are true; but when you call in this same public, make them jurors, where they can look into the faces of the witnesses and hear their testimony, where they are more or less acquainted with the character and reputation of the witnesses, they quickly estimate the amount of credence that should be given to the testimony of a self-confessed blackmailer. They quickly arrive at the truth.

This blackmailer charged Lee O'Neil Browne with having bribed him to vote for LORIMER. He was tried for that offense. He was tried by this same public before a court where both sides could be heard and by a jury instructed by the court to try the case on the evidence and not on newspaper charges, and the jury said, "Not guilty." He charged others with the same offense. Others so charged were acquitted. Still others submitted the truth of those charges to the same public when they again became candidates for their old positions, and the public again said, "Not guilty." And so in every case where the public have tried the very charges which the Senate is trying for the second time, they have said that Charles A. White is a blackmailer, a liar, the blackest of criminals; and upon investigation have said that there is no evidence to corroborate his statements.

In the one case we have the verdict of the people when they have not heard the evidence, and that verdict is "guilty." In the second case we have the verdict of the same people when they have heard the evidence, and their verdict is "not guilty."

I have little hesitancy in saying that if all the American people could read the testimony, could hear the arguments, could see the witnesses, the vote of the very people who are now condemning Mr. LORIMER would be almost unanimous in his favor.

The sentiment, however, the belief, is prevalent that Mr. LORIMER is guilty of acts of bribery. The evidence to my mind is that he is not guilty. And while I fully appreciate that no man can stand by his convictions in this case, if those convictions are favorable to Mr. LORIMER, without injuring himself, and while I know that already a vote for Mr. LORIMER has possibly defeated the return of Senators to this Chamber, and while it may affect me as it has affected others, I can only say that whether it injures or not the print of my footsteps toward political success shall never bear the stain of the blood of an innocent man.

Upon both the law and the facts Mr. LORIMER should be acquitted of this charge. He should be acquitted—

First, because, after a long and tedious trial he has been acquitted by the Senate of the United States; and so strong is the sentiment of the world against persecution that even in our Constitution and in the constitution of every State in the Union we declare that no man shall be twice tried for the same offense. This continued persecution to my mind is abhorrent, subversive of every principle of human justice, and destructive of human rights.

That the vote of the Senate in 1910, seating Mr. LORIMER, was the judgment of a body acting in its judicial capacity, and as such, entitled to all the consideration of a final judgment at law, can not be successfully questioned.

The rule was clearly enunciated by Senator Carpenter in the Ransom v. Abbott contest in the following words:

> The duty cast upon the Senate by this provision of the Constitution is judicial in character. We may not inquire or consider what party interests demand; whether it would appear impartial to decide against a political friend or whether a decision in his favor would be condemned in political circles. The question to be determined is one of strict right, depending upon legal principles, as settled by former decisions, parliamentary and judicial; and we have no more right than a judge upon the bench to turn away from the law to consider the political or partisan interest involved in the case or to be affected by the decision.

The vote heretofore had on this case, as well as the one which will probably be given to-day, shows how far we have wandered from the principle just enunciated, that the question is to be determined on strict legal principles, and that we have no more right than a judge upon the bench to turn away from the law to consider the political or partisan interests involved, and, I might add, the view of the public, not supported by the evidence.

As a judgment of this tribunal, acting in a judicial capacity, the vote to establish the right of Senator LORIMER to a seat in this body on the 11th day of March, 1911, is a final judgment, and we have neither the legal nor the moral right to unsettle that judgment. The rule of res adjudicata is just as applicable to that judgment as to the judgment of any other judicial tribunal.

I go even further, I think, than a majority of the committee in my conviction that a prosecution involving the question of the commission of an indictable offense ought on every principle of justice to be tried the same as a criminal prosecution, and that a defendant having once been acquitted should thereafter be forever protected against a second prosecution for the same offense.

But, even assuming that we should not adopt this latter view, and should consider the case as one in which a new trial might be had and the case reopened on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, still by every principle of law and equity we would be estopped from opening up this judgment, first, because the evidence, even if it had been admitted to be true, would be merely cumulative; second, because this cumulative evidence or claim of evidence has been disproved by overwhelming and conclusive testimony.

The newly discovered evidence must be of such character and strength that it is reasonably certain that it would have produced an opposite result if produced at the trial; it must be incontrovertible and conclusive; it must not be merely cumulative or corroborative. No such evidence has been offered as a basis for a new trial.

Second, he should be acquitted, because even though some of his ardent friends—false friends—may have used money to influence some of the criminally inclined in the Legislature of the State of Illinois to vote for him—and I do not admit nor believe a single vote was so influenced—if the number of votes vitiated by bribery, when deducted, still left a majority of honest votes in his favor, and if, also, he was not a party to such acts and had no knowledge of them, and the evidence is conclusive that he was not a party to and had no knowledge or information of such acts. The acts of one or two or three criminally inclined men can not and should not overturn and destroy the calm registered conviction of the honest majority of those voting.

The number of votes cast on the day on which Mr. LORIMER was elected was 202; 102 votes were a majority; Mr. LORIMER received 108. I do not believe that a single one of these 108 were influenced to vote for LORIMER by the use of money; but if, drawing upon our imagination rather than upon the evidence, we conclude that some two or three were so influenced, you would still have 105 untainted votes. And if he received 102 votes uninfluenced by any impure motive and he himself was ignorant of and not a party to any wrong committed by anyone acting in his behalf, then he has been honestly elected, and should retain his seat.

I am not going into the evidence to any extent. It has already been considered for days and weeks and months. I can only give my conclusion when I say that it is my honest and earnest conviction that Mr. LORIMER received more than 102 votes of honest men, honest votes, and neither I nor the Senate has therefore the moral right, though we may have the power, to deprive those 102 or more men of their legislative rights under the constitution of their State.

I shall, however, consider one phase of the testimony, enough to show the unclean hands of those that seek the destruction of Mr. LORIMER.

Charles A. White comes before this Senate and says in effect: "I am the worst character of criminal. I am not even a repentant criminal. For money I would do worse than murder. I would destroy forever the good name of a man, which is dearer than life. I sought to blackmail Mr. LORIMER. I wrote an article charging him with a crime. I was induced to write this article for no other purpose than that of extortion. I offered to suppress that article upon the payment of $75,000. He indignantly spurned my offer. But I was bound to have the money from some source, and so I found a great daily in the city of Chicago that was willing to publish my article and pay me $3,500 if I should agree to bolster it up. And so I sold my soul to hell for that $3,500. I have no regret, no shame, for what I have done. My only regret is that I secured such a small sum for so great a crime."

This man is the instigator of the charge. That he has not been killed is some proof of the patient endurance of the man he sought for cash to destroy.

Again, the evidence shows that there was what was called a jackpot in that legislature, from which funds were distributed to influence legislators on any subject. It is apparent from all the testimony that there were many legislative schemes in which funds were being used. I am morally certain from reading all the evidence that at least some, if not all, of those persons who received money—and I have no doubt but that some of them received money—received such money for votes upon other questions than the election of a Senator.

I am satisfied in my mind that this is true with reference to the bribery of Michael Link, Beckemeyer, and others. I believe Mr. Link received a thousand dollars and $900. He was caught with the goods, and he knew he was caught. He was arrested. He was put through the third degree. And right in connection with this third-degree inquisition I pause to call attention to one of the greatest crimes in our American court system—a crime that has grown up in our cities and often winked at by courts. The process by which evidence is sought in these cases is generally far more reprehensible than the crime sought to be uncovered. It is found from the testimony of Mr. Link that he did receive this money; that he did get it improperly; but that he did not get it for voting for Mr. LORIMER. He had to explain where he got it. He could be prosecuted. He was indicted for perjury, not bribery, and was then told by the prosecuting officers, through days of inquisition and torture, that if he would just say he got the thousand dollars for voting for Mr. LORIMER the case would be dismissed. He denied again and again that he got the money for voting for Mr. LORIMER. It nowhere appears that there was any attempt in all of that third-degree work to ascertain for what purpose he did get it. There were just two pictures presented to him—on the one side, penitentiary, disgrace, separation from family; on the other side, freedom. But freedom must be purchased by implicating LORIMER. He was weak. All criminals are weak; all bribe takers are weak. Were it not for their weaknesses they would not be criminals and bribe takers. And to save himself from the penitentiary he said, "I got it for voting for LORIMER."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. Link denied it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I am going to modify it. I say he denies it. The action was dismissed and he was a free man. He appeared before this investigating committee. He admitted again that he got the thousand dollars, but again denied that he got it for voting for LORIMER, and he even denied that he told those officers who were putting him through the inquisition that he so received it. He did not tell for what purpose he got it.

In my opinion Mr. Link never got a dollar for voting for LORIMER. His evidence is not only not in support of bribery, but that evidence and all the facts surrounding it establish to my mind that he obtained that thousand dollars from some other source and probably for a vote on some other question. He obtained it in a criminal way, but there is no evidence that a Lorimer fund furnished it.

One thing is clearly established; that is, that a fund called a jack pot had for some years been used in the Illinois Legislature. I do not know which would be the more appropriate name for it, "corruption fund" or "fund to satisfy blackmailers." One of the oldest and probably most vicious means of filching corporations by corrupt men who work themselves into legislatures, deceiving their constituents by their cries of fraud and the rights of the people, is the practice of introducing drastic bills which would work disaster to the business of such corporations and then desisting for a valuable consideration. The legislative journals of many States will show vast numbers of bills having no further purpose.

To meet the requirements of these cases and to silence these blackmailers, corporations whose interests are most liable to be assaulted have been in the habit of raising a defense fund used to answer holdup demands.

In the hearings in this very case this practice is described by Gov. Deneen, and he mentions the companies most liable to be held up and who are called upon to answer in hush money, as gas companies, electric light companies, liquor interests, stockyard companies, elevator companies, railroad companies, street car companies, and Pullman companies.

This practice became so brazen that it was necessary for these interests to meet and band themselves together to resist the holdup. This holdup system was in full sway and power during the session of the Legislature of Illinois of the year 1909.

This, in my opinion, was the fund out of which Link, Beckemeyer, and others received their donations. It is inconceivable to me that men should be bribed to cast votes for a candidate whom they had promised long before to vote for without any inducement. Bribes are used to secure hostile votes, not friendly ones. Out of this jack pot these criminals in the legislature received money; and to save themselves from the penitentiary, under a promise to dismiss indictments, these men were forced to say it was Lorimer money.

And in the face of the fact that after a thorough examination of every company in which Mr. LORIMER had an interest—the report of the committee shows that there was no Lorimer fund—we are asked, as Senators, to ignore the overwhelming testimony in Mr. LORIMER's favor and become a party to this persecution.

If any credence can be given to any testimony, it is quite certain that Mr. Link promised to vote for Mr. LORIMER some time in March, provided a Democrat could not be elected.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension. Neither one of those men ever admitted it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Holstlaw, I think, admitted it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is a different case. He was not before the grand jury.

Mr. McCUMBER. The promise was made directly to Mr. LORIMER in the presence of two of Link's neighbors and acquaintances.

If one will read the testimony from page 290 to page 311 he will get something of an understanding of the inquisitory methods adopted in this case for the purpose of securing a so-called confession. This evidence clearly shows that there was an organized conspiracy not to get at the truth of bribery but to force witnesses, in order to save themselves, to declare that money obtained by them was for voting for LORIMER.

In the first instance, Mr. Link was subpœnaed as a witness only, and yet for a week or so one of a force of detectives, having in view but one object, namely, to incriminate LORIMER, practically kept Mr. Link a prisoner, the detective even going to his home and staying four days with him there. One after another of the detective force and prosecuting attorney's force would proceed to weaken him by threats and promises into saying that he got the money for voting for LORIMER.

We first find Mr. Wayman, assistant prosecutor, attempting to get not a confession but a declaration that the money received by Link was for voting for Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. President, I have reduced this testimony to a narrative form for the sake of brevity, as we do when we take appeals from an inferior to a higher court, to reduce the cost of the transcript as much as possible, and to present only the salient parts of the testimony. Reducing this to a narrative form we have the following. Mr. Link said:

According to my recollection I told him [Wayman] that I voted for Senator LORIMER, and had no excuses to make for it. I denied absolutely that I had been paid for it. I told this to the whole grand jury.

Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to go briefly through this testimony, and I know that every Senator must be convinced that so far, at least, as the testimony of Link is concerned it shows a conspiracy not to get at the truth, but to implicate Mr. LORIMER by keeping out that portion of the truth which would free him from suspicion.

I denied receiving any money for voting for Senator LORIMER. I then left the grand-jury room. That was the 5th or 7th of May. I was then put into the custody of an officer. I was not indicted at that time and no complaint of charges was made against me. Mr. O'Keefe was with me most of the time. He was a detective appointed to the State attorney's office. He took charge of me. The first night I went to dinner with him. I remained in his custody and he kept his eye on me like I was a criminal. Another officer was Oake. He would not allow me to telephone to friends and was keeping his eye on me.

Remember this man was not arrested. He had had nothing but a subpœna to appear as a witness and state the truth, and he was kept a prisoner that he might not disclose the whole truth.

I was not allowed to discuss any matters at all. Other officers were armed and took out their revolvers and laid them on the table so I could see them. I was continually in charge of some officer of the States attorney's office.

I got a subpœna served on me to go to Springfield on my return home Saturday evening. I went to Springfield to answer this subpœna and a detective went home with me from Springfield and stayed with me. This officer went to my house, went home with me and stayed with me, was with me wherever I went. He was with me four days at my home until I insisted upon having him called off. There was no warrant for my arrest at that time, just a subpœna. The officer claimed that it was for my own protection that he was staying with me. I told him positively that I needed no protection, that I could protect myself. He was under orders from a gentleman in Chicago. He gave my wife a present while he was there, a present for his board.

I told Wayman, "If you have a warrant, arrest me; if I am guilty, arrest me; but no more detectives. I shall not submit to detectives any longer."

When I was in a room in a hotel in Chicago a young lawyer came in and asked O'Keefe why he was holding me in custody. The detective threatened that if this lawyer would not get out he would arrest him, and take him before the grand jury, something like that. He gave him to understand that he would have to keep away.

This lawyer had perhaps been sent by some friend to learn why this man who was not charged with any offense at that time was being treated as a criminal and held under arrest. It is evident that they did not wish Mr. Link to get away and tell all the truth. They wished to get a portion of the truth, a half truth, just enough truth to make a foundation for a false implication, which is equivalent to a whole lie.

After I swore to the grand jury that I had never got any money from Browne or anybody else, I was indicted for perjury by the same grand jury.

Remember, it was not for bribery but for perjury, and I will show you why, and you will understand why, as you read the testimony further:

Q. Was it for perjury for not telling them you had received money for voting for LORIMER?—A. That I had not met Robert Wilson—no money consideration in it at all, but that I had not met Robert Wilson.

After I was indicted I was taken to the State's attorney's office and talked with about my testimony. They kept flaunting the indictment for perjury, putting it in front of my face, showing it to me and speaking to me.

Q. Who did that?—A. The assistant State's attorney and the State's attorney himself.

Mr. Wayman would show it to me and talk to me about losing my home. He told me that if I would go before the grand jury and state that I had received some money from Browne and Robert Wilson that I would be cleared and go home a free man.

Not that he would tell the truth as to how he got it or for what consideration, but that he should admit that he got it from those two men, and by stopping there, the prosecution through the testimony of White, the blackmailer, could then connect these two men with LORIMER:

I told him that I had told all I knew, and he denied that I had. We kept up the conversation and he said he was a farmer himself in the early days, South. He says: "You come up here and let these Chicago lawyers get hold of you and they will take your farm away from you."

Was he really interested in the man's farm or was he interested in seeing that no attorney should get hold of him and get the full truth out of him?

That was the line of talk. He told me to rest over night—that was Friday evening—and to come in by 10 o'clock on Saturday morning and make a confession and he would have the perjury charge expunged from the record, and I would go home a free man. That was the sum and substance of the conversation. Had more than an hour's talk at that time. Then I was put in custody again. O'Keefe took me back to Morrison Hotel and stayed with me, stayed all the time. He took out his revolver and put it on the table in my presence. He talked with me about what the State's attorney talked to me about—

Now, mark this:

He talked with me about what the States's attorney talked to me about—about my going back and telling what the State's attorney wanted me to tell.

Not the truth, but what the State's attorney wanted him to tell, and as you go on further in the evidence you will find that the State's attorney wanted him to tell just so much and no more. He instructed him over and over again not to tell the truth, but only to tell a little of it. If he told only part, the prosecution could by the aid of a man, shown to be capable of committing any crime, connect up the line of testimony and make a prima facie case. If he told the whole truth, it destroyed their case and only implicated some one they were not after.

He said: "Link, I would not stand by the other fellows; I would stand by Wayman; he is the man to stand by in this matter; make a confession. I don't like to see you get into trouble, and you are going to get into trouble." That was the principal substance of the conversation. He took me to the State's attorney's office the next morning. McGuire, of the McGuire & White Detective Agency, talked with me. He was present nearly every time I met Wayman. McGuire tried to put words into my mouth several times.

Yes, not come and tell the whole truth, but say certain things, and lest he might not say just what he was wanted to say the words are suggested to him, or, as he says, attempted to be put into his mouth.

He said I should not be friendly to the Browne side and the LORIMER side, etc., it doesn't look well; that don't look well. I told him it was none of his business. I think one of the assistant State's attorneys told me that I had better tell what I knew, or would go to the penitentiary. I do not know whether McGuire said that to me or not, but his conversation ran on that line.

The assistant State's attorney, Mr. Arnold, came to me about 20 minutes before 5 o'clock in the evening and says, "Link, you have got just 20 minutes to save your life."

That is it. Your life or LORIMER'S.

I says, "What do you mean?" He says, "You have got just 20 minutes to go in and tell all you know to save your life." I says, "I have told all I know." He says, "All right, Link, it is your funeral; it is not mine." He goes into the grand jury room and an indictment was returned that evening.

He does not stop there.

I was told that night that I had been indicted for perjury.

Not bribery.

Mr. Wayman told me that. Mr. Wayman in talking to me laid more stress on the penitentiary than any of his assistants. He pictured it very strenuously—

Here is your third-degree work and its honesty—

He pictured it very strenuously between the penitentiary and my home.

Appealing to the dearest sentiment in a man's breast.

He said, "It will be much better for you to be here with your family than to go to the penitentiary and lose your home."

The family he left—the wife on one side, the penitentiary on the other side. Which would he take? He could purchase his freedom by one little sentence—"I got the money for my vote for LORIMER."

He pictured what the penitentiary was, etc.—

Think of it—

that I might lose my home and he put a great deal of stress upon the penitentiary and my home, I being a farmer and away from my home and my family.

Days and nights of torture, with the penitentiary and its iron bars, or the smile of the wife and children and happiness at home. This is the way evidence is sought to put a man out of the Senate of the United States.

Wayman pictured the penitentiary on one side and my home and my wife on the other; that I would lose my home, and that meant that I would lose my wife, too; that if I would go before the grand jury and tell what—tell what he wanted me to I could go home a free man and not a perjurer in any manner, shape, or form.

Not if he will tell the truth, not if he will make a clean breast of it, but if he will tell what Wayman wants him to tell, make a connecting link and stop there, without giving the entire truth.

That if I made acknowledgment that I had received $1,000 from Browne; that if I would say that I had received $1,000 from Browne for voting for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator, I could go home—that was not true; no, sir.

Then he adds:

Q. And that was what the State's attorney wanted you to tell the grand jury, was it not?—A. I presume just two answers, if I would answer when I went before the grand jury; that is all that Mr. Wayman asked me, was those two questions.

Q. Did Mr. Wayman tell you that you had been indicted and that he would take you before the criminal court for trial on that indictment if you didn't go before the grand jury and tell that body what Mr. Wayman wanted you to tell?

Not the truth.

A. Why, certainly; he said I would have to give a bond, and it was a $15,000 bond, and they made it $5,000, I think.

Q. Did Mr. Wayman tell you what he would do if you would go before the grand jury and tell them what he wanted you to tell them?

Not the truth, but what the prosecution wanted.

A. Nol-pros it and have it expunged from the record, so in future years it would not be on the record.

Q. Did you say to Mr. Wayman, "Well, I will go before the grand jury and lie if I have to; but I don't want to"? Did you say that or that in substance?—A. That in substance.

He would tell a lie to save his life and to remain with his family to escape the penitentiary.

I then told the grand jury that I had received $1,000 from Browne and I had received $900 from Robert Wilson; that is what I told the grand jury.

That was sufficient for their purpose, because White had made the other connecting link in his story. They wanted more. They wanted him to say "for voting for LORIMER," but were compelled to be satisfied with that. They had at least kept back the important truth as to the original source of this money payment.

Q. Did you tell the grand jury that you had received that money or any part of it for voting for Senator LORIMER for United States Senator?—A. Positively no.

Q. Just before you went before the grand jury that last time, did Mr. Wayman tell you that if you would go and tell the grand jury what he wanted you to you would keep out of trouble and keep from disgracing your family?—A. Yes, sir. Mr. Wayman took me before Judge McSurely and said: "Mr. Link has made a clean breast of the whole affair." I did not know what he called a "clean breast," but these were his words. I denied making a clean breast of anything except the truth.

And you might add just to the extent he was allowed to tell the truth:

Then the indictment was quashed, and I was allowed to go home.

Now, let us follow this up:

The next week I was put in custody of another officer. A subpœna was served on me to go to Springfield. I was then put in the custody of another officer. I wrote to Wayman that I would not submit to it, and told him personally when I went to Chicago, "No more detectives for me," that I was not a criminal and would not stand for it, and told him to recall Mr. O'Keefe, which he did.

At Mr. Wayman's advice—

Here again I ask the attention of the Senate. This is a most important proposition—.

At Mr. Wayman's advice I refused to answer questions at Springfield, and at his advice I refused to answer questions.

Why did Mr. Wayman wish him not to answer the questions? Can any Senator give an honest reason? You can nolle pros an indictment, no matter what the criminality may be, if you desire to use the party for a witness; but they did no want the whole answer brought out.

Mr. Wayman knew I had been summoned as a witness there. He told me not to answer, but to stand on the grounds that I might incriminate myself by answering any questions before the grand jury. I told him that I wanted to answer the question my way that were put to me there. He said: "Don't do it, Link, don't do it." He knew that I had been subpœnaed to testify before the grand jury on these matters.

Wayman in effect says to him: Do not go any further than to say you have got the money from these people. If I can not get you to say you got it for voting for Mr. LORIMER, I, at least, do not want you to say for what purpose it was paid you. I want enough to connect it with other testimony, and do not want anything that will destroy that chain of evidence.

Q. What did he tell you as to the subject matter? Did he tell you not to answer the questions of the State's attorney or the grand jury of Sangamon County?—A. The question all hinged upon one answer, "No" or "Yes," to one certain question, and that question was, "Did you receive or were you offered or do you know of anybody being offered any money in Springfield for voting on any question?" That was the question—

He could not get an opportunity to answer that on account of the interpositions, according to his testimony, of Mr. Wayman—and when I finally got permission from Mr. Wayman, which I answered positively, right straight out, "No." I answered "No." That is all there was about that. He wouldn't let me answer the question at all.

These are other questions. You can give just as much credence to them as you desire. I have given just enough of this testimony to show the conspiracy, the purpose of the prosecution not to get at the real facts, the real source from which the money came, but to prevent a full acknowledgment with a promise, "If you will say that you got it for voting for LORIMER, and so help us make a case against him, we will not prosecute you any further."

Q. Did you ever receive any money or any other thing of value from anybody—Browne, Wilson, or anybody else—on condition, or on the promise or agreement or understanding, directly or indirectly, that you were to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator?—A. I certainly did not.

Q. Did you ever receive any money from Lee O'Neil Browne, Bob Wilson or R. E. Wilson—whatever his name is—or anybody else, or from any source whatever, or did you receive any other thing of value at any time from anybody because you had voted for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator?—A. No, sir.

He had already said that he did receive the money; but in answer to that question he said:

No, sir.

Q. Was there ever any consideration moving to you, or to anybody for you, or for your benefit, in any place, from any source whatever, with the understanding that you were to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator, or if you had voted for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator, any consideration of any kind?—A. None whatever. I voted for Mr. LORIMER for the reason that I liked him and that I favored, and my people favored, the things he favored in relation to deep waterways from the Lakes to the Gulf.

The following testimony on cross-examination becomes more or less pertinent. It goes into details as to why he voted for LORIMER. On cross-examination we have this:

Q. Now, after you were indicted for perjury you were given the alternative of going before the grand jury and telling the truth, were you not, or be prosecuted for perjury?—A. I came before the grand jury to clear myself.

He does not answer directly that it was a question of truth, but to clear himself.

Q. And tell them the truth?—A. To clear myself.

He refuses to answer that question directly. He did tell the truth so far as he went, but he knows that he did not tell the whole truth.

Q. What do I understand by "clearing yourself"?—A. Telling them I had received some money.

Q. They (the third-degree methods) were the methods that made you tell the truth—they didn't make you tell a falsehood, did they?—A. They didn't ask me to lie; that is true.

But what did they do? They asked him to tell a little of the truth, and not the whole truth, and that is the worst kind of a lie.

Q. Now, Mr. Link, did you go back before the grand jury?—A. I certainly did, on Saturday morning.

Q. You told the truth and they nolled the indictment for perjury against you, didn't they?—A. Yes, sir; after I had answered those two questions.

He refuses again to say that it was after he had told the truth.

Q. When you went before the grand jury subsequently, you told them you got $1,000 from Browne?—A. I answered two questions—one was that I got $1,000 from Browne, and the other that I got $900 from Wilson.

Mr. President, the method adopted in securing the testimony of Mr. Link is of the same character, and the methods were exactly the same as the methods by which testimony was secured from other witnesses to blacken the character of Mr. LORIMER. Men were indicted for perjury, the jury in one case was impaneled, and those men were brought face to face with the penitentiary. The promise was then made that "if you testify you got the money for voting for LORIMER—not testify where you got it, not go into the details of it—but if you will only make an affidavit before the grand jury to that effect you will be with your family and your home; and if you do not, there is the penitentiary"; and the cowards said, "Yes; we will sacrifice LORIMER for ourselves." Mr. President, I would not convict a dog on testimony obtained in that manner.

I could go over a great deal of the evidence showing exactly the same condition, but I think that I have quoted it sufficiently to show the character of the prosecution, and I wish now to close.

Mr. President, the evidence in the Lorimer case shows that in the legislative assembly of 1909, as in previous legislative years, large sums of money had been raised and paid to legislators to influence legislation; that this fund was raised by liquor companies, electric light, gas, stockyard, elevator, railroad, street railway, Pullman car, and other companies, against whose interest holdup bills were being introduced; that this money so used was called "the jack pot" and paid out to those whose votes or influence had been used; that there was no Lorimer fund in that legislature and no money paid for voting for LORIMER; that a few dishonest legislators, who had undoubtedly received money for their influence or votes out of this jack-pot fund, were indicted for perjury in falsely swearing they had not received any money from certain persons; that through a most dastardly conspiracy and by a most criminal inquisition these men, already criminals, were promised absolute immunity for their crimes if they would commit another crime and say the money was obtained for voting for Mr. LORIMER; that they were bought to cloud the election of Mr. LORIMER to save themselves from the penitentiary for the commission of another offense.

Mr. President, that evidence further shows that Mr. LORIMER was fairly and honestly elected. This is the finding and the conclusion of the large majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who took the testimony, heard the witnesses, and had an opportunity to weigh their testimony; and this is also my own conclusion.

In honor bound to try this case on the evidence, I am equally bound in honor to conform my verdict to my conclusions upon that testimony and in accordance with the findings of honorable Members of this Senate who conducted the investigation.

I am further bound under the law of this case to declare by my vote that Mr. LORIMER, having been once tried and acquitted of this charge, can not by law, and ought not in good morals, be tried again on the same charge.

Mr. President, some time ago I received through the mail a clipping from the Washington Times of June 10, headlined "Going down with LORIMER." I believe this was sent me by a friend who desired to warn me of the danger of casting a vote in accordance with the law and the facts as established by the evidence. Possibly it might have been sent for another purpose. It matters little. This clipping reads:

> The issue of Lorimerism was pressed in the recent Iowa and South Dakota primaries, where two United States Senators were asking for indorsement of the Republican voters. KENYON, of Iowa, who was anti-Lorimer, swept everything before him by the greatest primary majority ever given a candidate in that State. GAMBLE, of South Dakota, went down in defeat because he supported LORIMER, although he had represented his constituency fairly well upon other issues.
> How many other United States Senators will sign their political death warrants on July 6 next?

And so, Mr. President and Senators, in order to avoid the fate of the one and enjoy the success of the other, I must disobey every mandate of law; I must ignore the testimony; I must vote to place a stigma of disgrace upon the brow of a fellow Senator who I believe to be innocent. I must not only commit an atrocious crime against him, but an equally atrocious crime against my own conscience.

Mr. President, whether in the Senate or out of the Senate, I must live with myself every day of my life, and I decline to keep company with a moral or a political coward.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am unaware as to whether there is any other Senator who desires to speak this afternoon. I understand, however, there is no one wishing to speak. If the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] desires to proceed, there is plenty of time for him to do so. If not, I was intending to move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I had intended to deliver, and do intend to deliver some extemporaneous remarks on this matter, but it is not material to me at what time I deliver them. If the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is chairman of the investigating committee, would prefer, merely for the sake of continuity, that no further interruptions be made or injected into the course of his argument, I will defer my remarks. I will say frankly that in what few remarks I shall submit to the Senate I do not intend to uphold the right of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in this body; and while I do not expect to advance any arguments of any weight or worth for consideration, yet if the Senator from Vermont, for any reason whatever, would prefer to proceed without interruption——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Montana should go on this afternoon.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the Senator would prefer that the continuity of his arguments be not further broken into, or if Senators are tired of a long and continuous session and had rather take a recess until Monday morning, I shall have no objection to deferring the making of what few remarks I have to make until Monday. It is immaterial to me. I am willing to submit the matter to the wish of the Senate.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, it makes no difference to me. I have spoken three hours to-day; I am tired; and I do not care to go further at this time. I intend to continue on Monday, and if the Senator from Montana would like to go on now, I have no earthly objection to his doing so.

Mr. SMOOT. And there is plenty of time this afternoon for the Senator from Montana to proceed. If the Senator from Montana does not desire to go on, then I shall move that the Senate take a recess; but if he had just as soon speak this afternoon, I should like very much that he should proceed.

Mr. MYERS. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if the Senator from Montana desires to proceed, I shall not now move a recess.

Mr. MYERS. I will submit some remarks at this time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will not be able, as are some Senators, to submit a carefully prepared address on this subject. I have not had the time or the opportunity to prepare myself therefor. My remarks will be largely of an extemporaneous nature, an extemporaneous expression of some thoughts that have come to my mind in the last few days in the study, consideration, and investigation that I have at different times given to this matter. My reason for expressing them is that, after having given some thought and consideration to the subject, I deem it to be a matter of such great moment and of such far-reaching importance to the people of the whole country, as well as to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], to the people of the State of Illinois, and to the dignity and honor of the Senate that I believe it to be the duty of every Senator on this floor who has given any especial thought or consideration to the question to express his views to the Senate, in the hope that out of all the discussion of this grave matter there may come some light from some source that may lead to a correct solution of the question at the bar of the Senate.

Further, my reason is that the dignity, the honor, the independence, and the manhood of the Senate are, I believe, just as dear to the hearts of the newer and younger Members of this body as they are to the older and more experienced Members. I do not believe that there can be any Member of the Senate to whom its honor, dignity, honesty, and independence mean more than to the newer and younger Members. I appreciate the distinguished honor of being a Member of this body, but only in so far as this body honors itself and maintains its honor, its dignity, and its independence.

In discussing this subject I wish to say at the outset that I do so absolutely without any personal feeling of ill will toward any person whomsoever. I do so solely from a sense of duty, and I do so with the most profound respect for those Senators who entertain different views from those entertained by me upon the law or the facts in the case, and especially with the greatest respect for those members of the investigating committee who have made a report in favor of Mr. LORIMER and who sustain his right to a seat in the Senate.

I know that all honest men can not think alike. I have been around courts too much not to know that all honest men can not look alike at any disputed question of fact or law. I know how hard it is to get 12 men on a jury to look alike at any disputed question of fact. I know how difficult it is to get members of a court, constituted of more than one judge, to look alike at questions of law. I know too well how many decisions are handed down from courts with majority and minority opinions to feel that everybody should look alike upon this question. I do not expect that, Mr. President, any more than I expect a large body of men to look alike at any other disputed question of law or fact.

I will say further that in what remarks I shall make I shall do so absolutely without any feeling against the subject of this investigation, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER]. During my service in the Senate I have had the pleasure of some acquaintance with him, and in what acquaintance with him I have enjoyed I have found him to be a very companionable and pleasant gentleman; modest, unassuming, and congenial; and against him as an individual I have naught to say, nor have I any feeling against him in any relation whatever.

With these few explanatory remarks I will say that even had I not intended to say anything upon this subject I would now, since the address of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], feel almost compelled to say something, because, while I know the Senator does not so intend, and while he is honest and conscientious in his convictions, the tendency of his remarks is to convey the idea that all of us who vote to unseat Mr. LORIMER are acting from cowardice, because of public opinion, or are pandering to the expression of the public opinion of the country. I say I think that might be construed to be the tendency of his remarks by anyone reading them and not knowing the Senator from North Dakota.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care what the people of my State think about this matter; I do not care what the people of Montana think about my course in this matter; I do not care what the people of the United States think about this matter or about my course regarding it; I do not care what the other Members of the Senate think about this case or about my course regarding it; I intend to decide it, so far as I am concerned, absolutely and solely upon the law and the evidence, as I would any other proposition involving law and facts brought before me for decision. I do not care what public opinion is. Public opinion is not a part of the record in this case, and I intend to stay as near as I can within the record.

The Senator from North Dakota rather complains that public opinion has expressed a sentiment about this case, and that it is an uninformed sentiment. I hardly see why the Senator says that. Why is the public uninformed about this matter? Has it not read the newspaper reports, the testimony, and the proceedings in the case? Did it not have an opportunity of reading them at the former trial of this case? Why anybody should say the public is uninformed is more than I can understand, but I care not what the public opinion about the matter is or whether it is informed or uninformed. It has nothing to do with the trial of this case.

As to the argument of the Senator from North Dakota, while it is an able argument and while I know that it is honest and conscientious, yet it has a strangely familiar sound to me. Where have I so often heard it before? In the criminal courts, from counsel defending men charged with crime. According to them, the prosecuting attorney must be put on trial instead of the defendant; they endeavor to make the jury think it is the prosecuting attorney who is the real criminal and who is on trial instead of the defendant.

The witnesses for the State are all liars and thieves and murderers and scoundrels, and the only honest men are the defendant and the witnesses who appear in his behalf. That seems to be the theory of some who have expressed opinions about this case, that all who have testified against Mr. LORIMER are scoundrels and unworthy of belief, and that all who have testified in his behalf are men of the most unimpeachable veracity and integrity. I would gather from some of the remarks that have been made that we should take this view of the case, the old familiar view in such matters of which we have often heard so much. The theory seems to be that the honest man is the man who takes the money and stays bought; that the honest man is the man who puts corrupt money down in his pocket and says nothing about it, who shields the infamous transaction by silence and, if brought into court and put under oath, can "perjure himself like a gentleman"; but the scoundrel is the man who, having committed a wrong, turns State's evidence and sets the wheels of justice in operation. That is the theory of which we hear so much in the criminal courts to-day.

That is one of the things that has served to bring the administration of criminal jurisprudence in this country into disrepute and make it compare unfavorably with the administration of criminal jurisprudence in Great Britain.

We are told that Lee O'Neil Browne has been a number of times acquitted by juries in this country. That proves nothing. The administration of criminal jurisprudence in this country is an absolute farce. There are more murderers discharged and held guiltless in any one of several States of this Union in a year than in all of Great Britain. The administration of criminal justice in this country has become a hissing and a byword. It has been condemned by the President of the United States for its laxity and failure to promote justice; it has been condemned by the American Bar Association; and it is a common theme of comment that every day men guilty of crime are pronounced not guilty by juries, and walk out of the courthouses of the land, sneering at justice, acquitted of something of which everybody in the community believes them to be guilty.

The fact that Lee O'Neil Browne has been acquitted in criminal proceedings in some cases arising out of this matter has absolutely no weight with me, and should have absolutely no weight with the Senate. That should not be taken into consideration. I believe that this body has sufficient ability, integrity, and independence to decide this case on its merits and of its own accord, following its own methods without taking into consideration what some criminal court may have done somewhere else.

To begin with, this is not a criminal case. Mr. LORIMER must not be proven guilty of anything beyond all reasonable doubt; he must not be proven guilty of anything at all. This proceeding is a civil proceeding; it involves a civil right—the right to hold an office—and the case must be decided by the preponderance of the evidence, and not at all by the rules of criminal procedure. There is no manner of room in this case for the theory of proof of guilt beyond all reasonable doubt. If it were a criminal trial, then if we, as jurors often do, should make up our minds to find a doubt and should go to hunting for a doubt, we might find it; because a juror never started out in the trial of a criminal case to hunt for a doubt that he did not succeed in finding it. But that has nothing to do with the trial of this case.

Having made these few remarks that seem to me to be called for by some of the able arguments that have preceded, I will turn my attention to some thoughts that have suggested themselves to me connected with the law and the facts of the case.

The doctrine of res adjudicata has been suggested in this case by one of the Senators who preceded me in the argument. It has been suggested by counsel for Mr. LORIMER in their brief, and has been suggested by the majority report of the committee.

I see nothing profound or intricate about that suggestion. It seems to me so simple and so plain that I believe any man who carries a license to practice law is warranted in discussing it. If this body, vested with plenary power in matters of this kind by the highest law of the land, the Constitution of the United States, has not the power to grant a new trial in such a proceeding, then it is the only court under the English system of jurisprudence of which I ever heard that has not such power.

Every court in the land, every court under the English system of jurisprudence, which is a court of general jurisdiction and common-law powers and a court of record, having a clerk and a seal, has the power to grant a new trial. I never heard of such a court that did not have the right to grant a new trial, either upon application of any party to the proceedings, or of its own motion. Any such court has the right of its own motion to set aside a judgment and order a new trial for anyone on any ground, and that, I claim, is exactly what has been done in this case.

This body, this court, of its own motion, has set aside and vacated the judgment heretofore entered in this proceeding, and ordered a new trial. The only courts of which I ever heard, under our system of jurisprudence, that have not the power to grant a new trial, are justice of the peace and police courts. Has the Senate of the United States sunk so low in the estimation of some of its Members that it is to be put on a plane with justice of the peace and police courts? They are the only courts of which I know that can not grant a motion of this kind; and in some States even those courts are given such powers by statute. If this body has not of its own motion set aside and vacated the judgment heretofore rendered and entered in this matter and ordered a new trial, I am at a loss to know how it could be done, and I should like to be informed to what procedure it would be necessary to resort in order to bring it about.

We are told by the majority committee report and by counsel for Mr. LORIMER that the Senate should proceed in this case carefully and painstakingly, by analogy comparing it with the proceedings in courts of law. That, I think, is what has been done in this case. I am willing to accept that admonition. In the district courts of my State, courts of general jurisdiction and common-law powers, trial courts of record, as in nearly all of the other States of the Union, if a judgment is rendered, had, and entered upon the trial of an action, any party to the action that is dissatisfied with the judgment may move to set it aside and ask for a new trial. It is true that must be done upon certain statutory grounds, which are enumerated in the statutes of the State. But this body is not hampered by any statutory grounds.

The Constitution of the United States gives this body ample and plenary power in matters of this kind. It gives it the power to judge of and determine the qualifications and election of its own Members. It does not say that after one hearing in a proceeding of this kind there must be allegations of newly discovered evidence, fraud, corruption, mistake, surprise, inadvertence, or deceit. It does not say there must be anything of the kind. It simply gives this body ample and plenary power, unlimited and unrestricted, in such matters.

Yet if we are to be guided by analogy to the practice in courts of law, that course has been pursued in this instance. Allegations were made to this body of newly discovered evidence. Very well, let us take it so and follow the analogy further.

We are now told by some in this body that it develops that there is no newly discovered evidence; that there is no new evidence in the case; and that therefore this proceeding, launched and started in good faith and with full understanding as a new trial of this matter, should be abandoned at this stage of the proceedings and held for naught.

As long as we are talking about analogy, I will ask who ever heard of a new trial being granted in a court of law on allegations of newly discovered evidence, and a new trial being had and the evidence being produced, and then of an attorney for the adverse side getting up and addressing the court and saying to the court, "It develops that there is no new evidence in this case, and the court should take the case from the jury and dismiss it without further proceedings"?

The new trial having been once ordered, the former judgment is vacated, and becomes functus officio. It is dead and can not be revived. It is a new doctrine to me, strange and unheard of, that a new trial may be granted upon allegations of newly discovered evidence, and then that the court at the new trial, after hearing the evidence, may say: "There is no newly discovered evidence. This court has been deceived and imposed upon. This case will not go to the jury the second time. The order granting a new trial is canceled, annulled, and rescinded, and there will be no new trial."

I never before heard of such a doctrine. If there is any analogy to State or Federal practice that can evolve such a doctrine, it is wholly new to me, and something of which I never before heard, and I do not believe it exists.

The new trial of this matter was granted upon allegations of newly discovered evidence. The new trial has been had, the evidence has been submitted, and it is for this body to say whether there is any newly discovered evidence. It is not for anyone else to say. It is for this body alone to say whether or not there is newly discovered evidence. And even if there is no newly discovered evidence, the order for the new trial having been made and the new trial having been granted, the case must be tried, argued, submitted, and decided again upon the evidence that is brought out at this trial, whether it involves any new evidence or not.

There is no such thing known to the law as turning back. There must be another verdict in this case. No analogy that can be suggested, in my opinion, can point to any other conclusion.

But even so, as I say, this body is not confined to the statutory grounds of newly discovered evidence to which State courts are confined in the granting and conduct of new trials. This body has powers of its own that are superior to any other, and can not be governed by the statutory provisions for the government of State or Federal courts.

Much has been cited in the brief of counsel for Mr. LORIMER on the subject of res adjudicata. A number of cases have been cited. But, after a careful study of those cases and the remarks of counsel concerning them, I fail to see anything to sustain the contention of counsel.

The case of Fitch and Bright, in connection with Lane and McCarty, from Indiana, is cited. But in that case Messrs. Fitch and Bright were seated. The Legislature of Indiana afterwards concluded to undo the matter and elect Messrs. Lane and McCarty. When Messrs. Lane and McCarty appeared here they were simply told that there were two duly accredited Senators occupying the seats of the Senators from the State of Indiana. If there is any analogy to this case or any res adjudicata about that, I utterly fail to see it.

In the case of Mr. DU PONT, from Delaware, which is cited by the learned counsel for Mr. LORIMER, Mr. DU PONT'S right to a seat in this body was tried and adjudicated. It was adjudicated adversely to him. Afterwards he made an application to this body for a new trial and a rehearing of the proceeding. Meantime, before that could come to a hearing, Mr. Kenney had been elected by the Delaware Legislature and accepted by this body as a Senator from the State of Delaware, and the rights of a third party had intervened. The rights of no third party have intervened in this case, and therefore, to my mind, the du Pont case is not applicable to this proceeding and is no authority in behalf of Mr. LORIMER. Nor do I find any other cases cited that sustain the doctrine of res adjudicata.

Indeed, from a careful perusal of the able brief of the learned counsel for Mr. LORIMER one would be led to the conclusion that the learned counsel had never heard of such a thing as a new trial; that in all of his life he had never heard of the new trial of an action or that such a thing was possible. Only in one instance, on page 88 of that able and interesting brief, are the words "new trial" mentioned. Save for that one might think the able counsel was in total ignorance of the law of new trial.

The proposition which, to my mind, governs this proceeding is absolutely and entirely ignored. I claim that for a new trial new evidence is not necessary, but I claim that, even so, there is new evidence in this case. While the claim is made that there is no new evidence, I claim that in a number of instances there is new evidence, and in one of the most important particulars, I think, there has been new evidence adduced, viz, to show that after visiting Senator John Broderick, Mr. Holstlaw deposited the sum of $2,500 to his own credit in a bank in Chicago.

At the former trial of the matter there was serious dispute as to whether there was any convincing evidence that Mr. Holstlaw had deposited any money in a bank to his credit after visiting Senator Broderick. It was the contention, and it was urged with much plausibility, that somebody had impersonated him in that transaction, and that the deposit slip was not made out by him, but was made out by some false impersonator who had gone there with strange design to injure Mr. Holstlaw and cast some reflection upon him, and to make him the beneficiary, strange to say, of $2,500, which he knew nothing about. The contention in that respect was that his name on the deposit slip was misspelled, and that it must have been made out by somebody other than Mr. Holstlaw—somebody who wanted to confer upon him the strange and mysterious favor of depositing to his credit in a bank the sum of $2,500 without his being aware of it—either to make him a present of that sum or in that wonderful and mysterious way to work some injury to him.

But the retrial of the case has established the fact that that deposit slip was made out by a clerk in the bank, and that Mr. Holstlaw did go there, and that while he did not personally and by his own hand make out the deposit slip, it being made out by an employee of the institution, Mr. Holstlaw did deposit $2,500 there immediately after the conference with Senator Broderick in which he received the sum of $2,500.

That incident is acknowledged now by gentlemen who take the other view of this case. It is acknowledged by the majority report in this case. That which is now acknowledged and conceded on all sides was before a very seriously disputed point, and it was stoutly contended by the defenders of Mr. LORIMER to the last that there was no evidence that Mr. Holstlaw was the man who deposited the $2,500. That is some new evidence, sufficient alone and in itself to authorize another trial of this case, if any ground be necessary.

I will say no more about the doctrine of res adjudicata. From what has been said about it in the committee report and on the floor of the Senate, I hardly believe it is seriously taken or advanced. I hardly believe this body is going to contend that it is the only court under the English system of jurisprudence, except police and justice of the peace courts, which has not the inherent power on its own motion to grant new trials; and I pass along from that subject.

Now, then, as to the facts of this matter. I have heard and read long, entertaining, and learned explanations of why those 53 Democrats in the Illinois Legislature voted for Mr. LORIMER, a Republican. I meet those arguments with the simple declaration that whenever there is a serious contest in a legislature over the election of a United States Senator, and when under those circumstances a Democrat who is a member of that legislature votes for a Republican for United States Senator there is something the matter either with his head or his morals, or both.

Of course I can understand that in some instances which have been cited here, as in the New England States, where we will say there are a hundred members of the legislature, and 70 of them are Republicans and 30 are Democrats, and the 70 Republican members caucus and unanimously agree to support for election or reelection some efficient public servant and greatly beloved man (as I understand was the case with the late lamented Senator Frye, of Maine, upon one occasion), the 30 Democrats, knowing that the 70 Republican votes will elect, anyway, and having no one whom they especially wish to compliment by their vote, may vote for the Republican candidate, knowing he will be elected, anyway, and without their votes. I can understand that sort of reasoning and that sort of conduct. But I say, in a legislature where there is a close and a serious contest and a Democrat votes for any Republican for the position of United States Senator it is a strong presumption, to my mind, that there is something wrong either with his head or his morals or both, and probably both.

Men do not violate trusts of that character with impunity and without some underlying motive. They are not voting for themselves. They are not voting their own convictions. They are voting in a representative capacity. They are acting in a trust capacity for their constituents; their constituents have elected them, and by their votes have said that they want a Democrat elected United States Senator; and when they go to the legislature and grossly betray that trust, I say it is a strong presumption that there is something wrong; it is sufficient at least to put the public upon guard and to arouse suspicion. They must show me.

Now, as to motives. The entire fight on the other side centers on Charles A. White. If he had put into his pocket the money which he had received and had maintained discreet silence, had said nothing, and had not started this proceeding, I presume he would have been an honest man and would have been honored and esteemed by his associates in crime. But Charles A. White committed what is to criminals and rogues the unpardonable sin of all sins—he turned State's evidence and dragged others into the light of exposure, and to men of that class that is the greatest crime any man can commit, being, in their estimation, even worse than murder. Therefore he is an unbelievable scoundrel, we are told. But I am not ready, offhand and instantly, to accept that view of the matter.

Which is the more reasonable to believe—that Charles A. White, having never received a dollar of money from anybody for or on behalf of Senator LORIMER, having never accepted one dollar of corrupt money in regard to the senatorial election in Illinois, being absolutely clean in regard to this proceeding, would sit down and deliberately and maliciously concoct and make up and weave out of whole cloth this entire proceeding, being in its entirety without a shred of truth or honesty or fact, against an innocent set of men, against Mr. LORIMER, Lee O'Neil Browne, Wilson, and others associated with him; that he would attempt to draw them all down through fabrication and malice to the utmost depths of infamy and degradation—I ask which is the more reasonable theory in this matter, that, or the theory that Charles A. White was paid and accepted money to vote for Mr. LORIMER for United States Senator, and is telling the truth when, as we say, he turned State's evidence about it? Which is the more reasonable theory of the matter; which is the more borne out by the facts and circumstances in the matter?

I say this case does not rest alone upon the testimony of Charles A. White. He is corroborated by the testimony of other direct witnesses. He is corroborated by a thousand facts and circumstances and incidents. He is corroborated by everything in the case which tends to point to the true state of affairs.

To my mind the theory that there is a monstrous conspiracy, that Gov. Deneen and the owners of the Chicago Tribune, the Chicago News, and the Chicago Record-Herald, and State's Attorney Wayman, and Charles A. White, and all these people sat down and put their heads together and deliberately concocted a vile and false conspiracy stranger than anything in the Arabian Nights, Baron Munchausen, or Jules Verne's writings—an utter fabrication, willfully and knowingly, on the part of all these people, each and every one of them—for the sole purpose of destroying an innocent and an honest man, has too much of the romancing, too much of the skyrocketing, too much of the airship appearance about it to commend itself to me.

You either have to believe Charles A. White and those who testified with him, and believe all the facts and circumstances that go to bear out his theory and his testimony, or you have to believe that Mr. Kohlsaat, of Chicago, the proprietors and editors of the Chicago Record, the Chicago Tribune, the Chicago News; that Gov. Deneen, State's Attorney Wayman, the attorney general of Illinois, the prosecuting attorney of Sangamon County, the prosecuting attorney of Cook County, and scores of other officials and well-known men deliberately entered into the most monstrous conspiracy ever known to the history of mankind to wreck a purely innocent and honest man. I can not accept that theory of romancing and aeroplaning and skyrocketing. It does not commend itself to my judgment or reason at all.

This theory, of which I hear much in the committee reports and in the brief of counsel for Mr. LORIMER, as to why these people entered into this monstrous conspiracy—that during a long period of years back Mr. LORIMER upon different occasions had offended the editor of the Chicago Record-Herald, had offended the editor of the Chicago Tribune, had offended State's Attorney Wayman, had offended Gov. Deneen, had offended this man and that man, all because each and every one in turn had asked him to do something that he did not think was right, and that he refused the request, and thereupon each and every one of these men conceived an implacable and immeasurable degree of malice toward Mr. LORIMER and all these years have laid it up for him and carried it against him, and when they found Charles A. White all came together with one accord and said we have found the time, the place, and the man to carry out this nefarious scheme, this monstrous conspiracy, and that they thereupon got together upon that occasion and manufactured all this evidence, is to my mind too much like the Arabian nights. It does not commend itself to me at all.

With all the facts and circumstances, I think, it is more reasonable to believe that Charles A. White and the other witnesses who directly corroborate him about the facts and circumstances and times and places and payments and conditions are telling the truth, some of them reluctantly, some of them voluntarily, but they are telling what actually transpired. Is it reasonable to believe that Charles A. White and those who corroborate him would give their testimony as they did and would consign themselves to infamy and disgrace in the eyes of all men, that they would put themselves in this extremely disagreeable attitude, that they would bring obloquy and oblivion upon themselves if there was not one word of truth in all that they have told? Do innocent men who have done no wrong, who have committed no crime, do those things? Do they bring these consequences and results upon themselves? It is contrary to all the experience and observation and reasoning of mankind.

There are very, very many facts and circumstances and incidents that, to my mind, absolutely bear out the truth of the testimony given by Charles A. White and those who corroborate him. Take this man Wilson, who, it is said, took a part in the nefarious work and engaged in a part of the corruption and bribery. During the former hearing of this case, when evidence was being taken before the investigating committee, this man Wilson fled from the United States, went to Canada, registered at a hotel under an assumed name, and remained there during the entire proceeding.

Is that the way innocent men do? Is that the way honest men do? Is there a single Member of this body who during any court proceeding has ever fled from the United States, gone to Canada, registered at a hotel under an assumed name, and remained there until the proceeding was over, and then returned to this country?

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator yield long enough to allow me to suggest that Wilson did testify in the hearings?

Mr. MYERS. If I am incorrect I am glad to be set right.

Mr. FLETCHER. He testified here in Washington, and his testimony is a part of the record.

Mr. KENYON. But he did go to Canada and register under an assumed name, as stated by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I stand corrected to the extent of his having returned and testified.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question is that the Senator stated that Wilson remained away during the whole proceeding. He did go to Canada but he returned and testified finally before the committee here, and his testimony is a part of the record.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator enlighten us upon the question as to why he ran away in that instance?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no idea. I only know that he said he was an ill man and he went because of his health. That is not the question at all, to my mind. I know that the Senator from Montana did not want to make a statement that was not accurate, and I took the liberty of correcting it to the extent of stating that Wilson did return here and did testify, and his testimony is a part of the record. Whether he went to Canada or went to Europe is utterly immaterial and does not bear on the question, and why he went does not bear on the point I make.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just for information, since the Senator is shedding light on the subject, I should like to ask if it was necessary for him to register under an assumed name in order to have his health restored.

Mr. MYERS. I stand corrected to that extent. It seems that I was in part in error and in part correct. This record is so voluminous and there are so many reports and treatises upon it that I have not been able, I will admit, to thoroughly master it all. But I stand corrected gladly to that extent.

I presume if Mr. Wilson was ill, registering in Canada under an assumed name benefited his health very greatly. It seems that doing it restored him to health sufficiently to return to this country and testify. But at any rate, it seems that when the hearing came on he left the country and went to Canada and there registered at a hotel under an assumed name. By that I am reminded that Holy Writ tells us that the wicked flee when no man pursueth. But I believe they generally flee a whole lot faster when somebody is after them. It very much accelerates their flight to have somebody after them. I am reminded, too, of the case of Mr. C. F. Wiehe, who I believe the evidence shows was advised by Mr. Edward Hines to get out of the State of Illinois because the grand jury was in session. The wicked generally flee when the grand jury is in session. There is nothing that hurries them up like a grand jury.

Are those the ways of honest men? Do those circumstances indicate nothing in this case? What are the bearings of those circumstances, and scores of other circumstances like them? To my mind they all point inevitably to the conclusion that White and those who corroborate him are telling the truth.

I have observed, I think, one tendency in the majority committee report in this case, and that is to admit—in fact it has been admitted by the Senator who preceded me—that money was paid to and received by some of these men in their official capacity as legislators, but to ascribe it to other sources and motives than those charged in this case. It seems to me that is largely the indulgence of surmise. I read in the majority committee report, and it has been admitted here on the floor by the Senator who preceded me, that several different members of the legislature received money, but it is denied that they received it for their votes for Mr. LORIMER. It is contended that they received it for other purposes, and when this witness and that witness and another witness says:

Yes; I received money from Lee O'Neil Browne or from Wilson, but I did not receive it in consideration of my vote for Mr. LORIMER; I had already promised to vote for Mr. LORIMER, or I would have voted for Mr. LORIMER any way; I do not know why this money was paid to me, but it was not paid to me and not received by me in consideration of my vote for Mr. LORIMER—

Those men are all put down as good men, as honest men who are telling the truth and whose word we must accept.

But see; who comes here now? What have we now? Charles A. White appears on the scene. He testifies that he received money and that it was paid to him by Lee O'Neil Browne, and was paid to him and received by him in consideration of his vote for Mr. LORIMER for United States Senator. Presto, change! Unspeakable scoundrel, miserable wretch, degraded creature—the truth is not in him. He has sunken to the depths of infamy and degradation; he traces this to money used in connection with Mr. LORIMER's election.

I do not see, under the circumstances in this case, why it may not be considered that Charles A. White is telling the truth when he gives his version of these money transactions as well as the others who admit the taking of the money but deny that it was received in consideration of their vote for Mr. LORIMER, when all the facts and circumstances and incidents in the case tend to show that they were all in the same boat and that the money was paid to all for corrupt purposes, and probably for the same corrupt purpose.

In going over the testimony of the record in this case there are circumstances and incidents that it would take days upon days to comment upon, and all of which, to my mind, point unerringly to the guilt of those who were charged with corruption in this case.

Many, many facts and circumstances and incidents there are. They can not possibly all be enumerated in any one argument or any series of arguments; but, taking the record as a whole, from my reading of it, in my opinion, it is reeking with infamy and dripping with corruption and redolent of crime. The whole record shows conclusively to my mind that there was corruption in the air and corruption on the ground at the time of the election of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in this body.

The evidence in this case conclusively stamps such men as Lee O'Neil Browne and Wilson and Edward Hines as men who lend themselves to any scheme of corruption that will further any interest that they have in any matter that may be advanced by any means whatsoever known to the coarse and brutal power of money. Take the record of the proceedings of this case on the day of the election of Mr. LORIMER. The very atmosphere was charged with the knowledge that there was corruption on the ground. It was charged on the floor of the legislature and bandied back and forth. Everybody seemed to know what was going on and how it was going on, and it is too much for human credulity for me to believe that the beneficiary of it all, Mr. LORIMER, was serene and innocent and had no knowledge of what was going on upon that occasion. His associations with Lee O'Neil Browne, both before and since, show him to be in privity with all thereof.

I will read some extracts from some of the proceedings on that day which give some indication of what was seen and known and heard and felt of all men upon that occasion. I quote from an account of the proceeding:

During the talking which inevitably preceded the ballot, only one roll call being necessary to decide the senatorial issue, although that one consumed over two hours and a half, some ugly charges were made by intimation. They afterwards gave rise to the statement that an investigation of methods by which Mr. LORIMER might have secured Mr. Hopkins's place would be asked for in the United States Senate. This statement was promptly squelched by Mr. Hopkins himself.

"I am through," said the former Senator. "I shall not contest the election of Mr. LORIMER. I am through with it."

* * * * * * *

"That is not altogether for Senator Hopkins to say," said Col. Frank L. Smith, who accompanied him from the scene of defeat. "It is for the members of the legislature and the Republican voters of Illinois to determine whether they are satisfied with the manner in which Mr. LORIMER secured his election."

In spite of that statement it was admitted that so far as the Hopkins people are concerned, the election of Mr. LORIMER is final, and that no demand will be made by them or for them that the charges hinted at by Democrats themselves on the floor of the house during debate be investigated.

Here is one of the choice expressions used by that alleged Democratic leader, Lee O'Neil Browne, he who led his forces not to victory, but to infamy, that day on the floor of that house. He said:

You can't cash dreams and you can't cash hopes.

We are told that you can't cash dreams and that you can't cash hopes.

Another member shouted, and he asked:

What can you cash in this legislature—votes?

Those are samples of the charges that were hurled back and forth.

The infamous leader, Lee O'Neil Browne, felt it necessary to make a speech of about one hour's duration in explanation of his vote. Why is it that when a man does something that is questionable he always wants to make an explanation? If a man is going to do something wrong, I think he had better do it, and say nothing about it; the less that is said about it the better; but Mr. Browne that day felt called upon to make a speech of about an hour's duration in explanation of the remarkable stand that he had taken and of the remarkable vote that he was about to cast. Speaking of Mr. LORIMER he said:

I could state a thousand reasons why WILLIAM LORIMER now should be the choice of the Democratic party and its members.

A thousand reasons why he should vote for Mr. LORIMER! Yes; I believe him. I believe he had a thousand reasons why he should vote for Mr. LORIMER, and I believe he had every one of those reasons in his pocket, or that he had in his pocket a bank certificate of deposit for them, and on every one of those reasons I believe there was an imprint of an American eagle and the words "In God we trust."

He should have been honest and told what kind of reasons he had. After he had ceased to speak another Democratic member of the legislature arose and said:

I want to ask you Democrats, Do you expect to tell the whole reason? Every reason that can be given for your votes?

If you do, your people will retire you into that oblivion where you rightfully belong.

* * * * * * *

Representative J. Groves absolved himself from further leadership of Browne, and added fuel to the scorching flames with this declaration, which sent an electric spark through the sweltering assembly: "The gentleman from La Salle said there was a knocking at the Democratic door, summoning us to vote for a Republican for Senator."

Then, he went on to say that there was a knocking at the Democratic door—the knocking of opportunity, but it was the opportunity to put the three gilded balls of the pawnbroker above the door of the Democratic Party of Illinois. This ran on during the entire voting, two hours and a half.

More of it:

It is said on the other side that there was a knocking on the Democratic door. Yes; there has been much knocking at doors, and there is a new sign on the Democratic door. Before that door there hangs this day, and for many days will hang, as a result of this day the three balls that signify what you mean and what you have done.

The proceedings of that day appeared to be no secret. I think from my investigation of the record and from my reading of the proceedings of that day, that they lacked only one thing to complete the infamy of the State of Illinois.

The thing lacking was that the Stars and Stripes, which float over the statehouse at Springfield, should have been hauled down from the flag mast, and in their place should have been run up the red flag of the auctioneer. That would have capped the climax and would have completed the infamy of that day. That red flag of the auctioneer should have defiantly flaunted there until this very day and until this matter is settled right by this body.

The power of money is the greatest evil in this world; it is the greatest evil with which this country to-day must contend. The Money Trust is the most serious problem that confronts this Government. Beside it all others pale into insignificance. It is productive of more harm, of more misery, of more wretchedness, of more corruption, of more ills than all the other evils of this Government to-day. Its ramifications into every avenue of society and political life are sapping and undermining society and our political existence. It is charged that it influences courts and executive departments and legislatures; but when it works its way into this body by insidious and devious methods and makes its coarse and brutal power, to the subversion of right and justice, felt in this body, the Senate should say that its influence shall no longer be tolerated here; that this is one place where it shall not enter with its baneful effects to pollute everything with which it comes in contact.

The awakened conscience and sentiment of the American people demand; right and justice demand; the honor, the integrity, the manhood, and independence of this body demand; and I believe that the record, the circumstances, and the evidence in this case demand that we shall take a stand for right and justice and purity of elections to this body by declaring that the title by which Mr. LORIMER holds a seat in the Senate was secured by corrupt means and that it shall be forfeited and set aside.

I thank the Senate, Mr. President, for its kind attention.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE MALBY, OF NEW YORK.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, late a Representative from the State of New York, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions (H. Res. 596), as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 6, 1912.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expense in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is necessarily absent from the Chamber this afternoon. At his request and in his name, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The resolutions (S. Res. 353) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed under the second resolution as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. ROOT, Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. JONES, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. BACON, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. THORNTON, and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I now move, as a further mark of respect to the deceased, that the Senate take a recess until Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, July 8, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 6, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, once more in the dispensation of Thy providence our hearts are bowed in sorrow and grief. Surely in "the midst of life we are in death." We know not the moment when the summons shall come, but with perfect faith and confidence in Thee who doeth all things well, help us to do the work Thou hast given us to do faithfully, conscientiously; going forward to meet the shadowy future with brave and manly hearts. Comfort us, the bereaved wife and children, in the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul. In the name of Him who said, "I am the resurrection and the life; whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOSEPH H. CALL (H. DOC. NO. 865).

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the address of Joseph H. Call, of Los Angeles, on May 3, 1912, on the Higher Cost of Living and its Relation to Transportation.

Mr. Call was special counsel for the Government for 18 years, and this address is most valuable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document an address of Mr. Call, of Los Angeles, Cal., on the Higher Cost of Living. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman whether this has been submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Printing?

Mr. RAKER. No, sir; it has not.

Mr. MANN. I shall not make an objection, but will make the suggestion to gentlemen who desire to have matters printed as House documents that they ought first to be submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman that I did not know that had been the practice. If I had known it I would have done so.

Mr. MANN. It has not been the practice to print things of this sort as House documents, but it is coming to be the practice, and I think not a bad practice; but I think, as a rule, they ought to be submitted in advance to the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RAKER. I think so; and hereafter I will follow that rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ALABAMA INDIANS OF TEXAS (H. DOC. NO. 866).

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a report by Mr. William Loker with reference to the Alabama Indians of Texas, and certain letters from the department with reference to those Indians.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to have printed as a document a report by William Loker and certain letters of the Indian Department relative to the Alabama Indians of Texas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 57):

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 23515) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6784. An act for the relief of the Garden City (Kans.) Water Users' Association, and for other purposes; and

S. 7195. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 20684. An act providing for the sale of the Lemhi School and Agency plant and lands on the former Lemhi Reservation in the State of Idaho.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 220) to grant American citizenship to Eugene Prince.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon corporation a right for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DU PONT, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 6084) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S.

4862) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and settle certain accounts, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4445) concerning unrigged vessels.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

H. J. Res. 332. Joint resolution appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers for the Organized Militia.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 6946. An act authorizing the sale of certain lands in the Flathead Indian Reservation to the town of Ronan, State of Montana, for the purposes of a public park and public-school site;

S. 5935. An act to fix the terms of the district court for the western district of Michigan;

S. 6603. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the board of education of New Hanover County, N. C., portion of marine-hospital reservation not needed for marine-hospital purposes; and

S. 4862. An act for the relief of certain persons having supplied labor and materials for the prosecution of the work of constructing the Corbett Tunnel of the Shoshone irrigation project.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 24227. An act to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public-building acts, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909; and

H. R. 21259. An act to allow an exchange of certain lands in the Harney National Forest.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 7195. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 6784. An act for the relief of the Garden City (Kans.) Water Users' Association, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

DEATH OF HON. GEORGE R. MALBY.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the House the death of the Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, one of my colleagues, which occurred in the city of New York yesterday evening. I will state that the funeral of the deceased will take place at his late home at Ogdensburg, on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock. At a future day I shall ask the House to set aside a time that Members may pay tribute to the life, character, and services of the deceased. I now offer the following resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 596.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expense in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following committee:

Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. DWIGHT, Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio, Mr. SULZER, Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. SMITH of New York, Mr. MOTT, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. DE FOREST, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. WEDEMEYER, Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, Mr. SLOAN, and Mr. J. M. C. SMITH.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the additional resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, July 8, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 8, 1912.

(Continuation of legislative day of Saturday, July 6, 1912.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and after a little delay the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Culberson	Johnston, Ala.	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Cullom	Jones	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Curtis	Lea	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smoot

Chamberlain	Gronna	Perkins	Townsend
Clapp	Guggenheim	Pomerene	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Heyburn	Root
Crawford	Johnson, Me.	Simmons

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. DILLINGHAM resumed the speech begun by him on Saturday (see Senate proceedings of July 9). After having spoken for nearly four hours, he said:

Mr. President, I had hoped to finish my remarks to-day, but I have been rather anxious to direct the attention of the Senate to the evidence in the case, and it has taken much more time than I anticipated. I have now been speaking nearly four hours, and I understand that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is willing to go on this afternoon. With the consent of the Senate, I will be glad to resume to-morrow morning when I will promise to finish. I yield the floor to the Senator from Florida, unless there is objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17937) authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plant.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric-transmission lines, across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 6084) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 20684) providing for the sale of the Lemhi School and Agency plant and lands on the former Lemhi Reservation in the State of Idaho, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Root
Bacon	Crane	Lea	Shively
Bailey	Cullom	Lippitt	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Cummins	Lorimer	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Curtis	McCumber	Smith, S. C.

Bryan	Gamble	Overman	Tillman
Burnham	Gronna	Page	Williams
Catron	Heyburn	Penrose	Works
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins
Clapp	Jones	Pomerene
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Rayner

Mr. THORNTON. I again state the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER]. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senate adopted a resolution June 7, 1911, naming a committee and authorizing, empowering, and directing it to forthwith investigate "Whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices." The committee was "further and specially instructed to inquire fully into and report upon the sources and use of the alleged jack-pot fund, or any other fund, in its relations to and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate."

Beginning June 20, 1911, the committee examined 186 witnesses, took 8,588 pages of testimony, exclusive of exhibits, and has made report. Minority views have also been submitted, together with the resolution under consideration, declaring the election invalid.

It will be remembered that a similar investigation was conducted, beginning September 22, 1910, and ending December 7, 1910, through a subcommittee, which reported to the full committee December 17, which reported to the Senate December 20, 1910, and the minority views of two members of the committee, respectively, were filed later.

Lengthy discussions were had, and finally a vote was taken March 3, 1911, resulting in the defeat of a resolution condemning the election of Senator LORIMER, practically to the same effect as the one now offered.

The same election is involved now.

The testimony taken by said subcommittee has been substantially repeated in most parts. Much additional testimony has been taken in this second investigation.

The Senate of Illinois on the 17th day of January, 1911, appointed a committee to investigate the election here involved, and on May 17, 1911, that committee made its report, and on May 18, 1911, the Senate of Illinois adopted a resolution declaring that, "based on the report and findings of said committee, the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to a seat in the United States Senate was brought about by bribery and corruption." That resolution, with a copy of said report, and of the evidence taken, were certified to and filed in the United States Senate June 6, 1911, and was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It is fair to say there was not a full hearing in that instance, and the affidavits of a special agent, pretending to set forth statements made to him, which have been shown to have been untrue, were received as testimony.

BASIS OF REINVESTIGATION.

It was claimed that new eivdence had been discovered since March 3, 1911, or that new and additional evidence existed and could be found. The directions and authority to the special committee were plain and more or less specific.

On February 7, 1911, I submitted some remarks on the case as it then stood, and I shall not review the case as presented by the former record in detail. I shall more particularly consider what the new lines of inquiry developed and what the additional testimony shows.

We have some further light on the situation at Springfield just preceding the election, May 26, 1909, and on political conditions then existing and their influence as an impelling cause in that election.

First. The story of the alleged $100,000 fund was exhaustively searched and we shall need to analyze that.

Second. The alleged jack-pot fund and its handling and all the circumstances surrounding and growing out of it were inquired into, and we must examine that testimony and ascertain what relation, if any, all these may have had to the election in question.

Third. The result of the long struggle at Springfield, in the forty-sixth general assembly, and the final vote for United States Senator, including the action of the Democrats in that matter, we will consider, and we will find, I submit, they are most reasonably accounted for on other than corrupt grounds.

I hold that a careful survey of the evidence, and all the surrounding circumstances, will satisfy the faithful, impartial investigator that conditions, political mainly, and personal and local, not the use of money or other improper means, in respect to the senatorial election, brought about the election of Senator LORIMER. I further hold that the moving, actuating causes which led to the final vote and the result of that contest were free from corrupt practices and methods, so far as Senator LORIMER was concerned, or any one authorized by him, or acting with his knowledge or consent, and so far as bringing about his election was accomplished.

Under like conditions as then and there existed, including the absence of corruption in the Senatorial election, the same result would naturally and logically follow to-day. There was no need to purchase votes, and none in fact were purchased for him. There was no payment of money for or because of votes cast for him. It is absurd to claim, because it is believed to be shown that money was paid to and received by certain members of the legislature, at that session, lasting some six months, during which numerous measures were introduced and considered involving liquor interests, railroad interests, the fish industry, division of judicial circuits, patronage, "jobs," reshaping the laws concerning corporations, grafting propositions of various kinds, that such use of money was connected with and had to do with the election of United States Senator, in the absence of reliable, legal evidence to that effect. It does not follow that every joint act of that legislature was illegal and void.

It is still more absurd to hold that after the election money was paid to members who voted for Senator LORIMER, notwithstanding such members had no reason to expect and no cause to claim remuneration for their votes. If money was used or improper practices were resorted to, Senator LORIMER had no part therein, or knowledge thereof, nor does it appear that anyone furnished any money for use in his election. The use of money or the employment of improper practices were not necessary to nor did they contribute to his election. There can be no warrant for the finding that corrupt practices were employed and money was distributed after the election voluntarily by people who if they had it would have kept it and to people who had and asserted no claim on it, and if they had, were helpless to enforce such claim. If this has ever taken place in the history of the world there is no authentic case recorded. It would be contrary to human nature and at war with all human experience. It would be in irreconcilable conflict with the corrupt character of such men as would participate in such a transaction. Honor among thieves never extended that far wherever it may have obtained.

For instance, Holstlaw says he was ready to vote for Mr. LORIMER, had made up his mind to do so, without any inducement whatever having been offered him; he volunteered to Broderick and to others the assurance that he would do so. He did so vote; Mr. LORIMER was elected. Does anyone believe, if Broderick had any amount of money to use in purchasing votes for LORIMER, that some time after that election he would have voluntarily sent for Holstlaw and freely paid to him any part of the money? Broderick had no need to either promise or pay Holstlaw anything for his vote. There was some real reason for the payment of that money to Holstlaw by Broderick in no wise connected with the senatorial election. It was Holstlaw's money in Broderick's hands, placed there as his share of the proceeds arising from some legislative action, or it may have been the contribution of the liquor interests to his campaign, in which he carried every "wet" county and lost every "dry" county in his district, although he was supposed to be a "dry" man and candidate. It was not money which Broderick could retain in silence if he liked. It may have had to do with binding Holstlaw to some future action or course. It was not likely the self-imposed price of some past action. It was, then, not paid to him because of or in consideration of his vote for Mr. LORIMER. In that case it would have been simply a donation by one in no wise obligated to make it. It would have been such a generous recognition of a favor as the most exaggerated credulity will not credit Broderick with. It does not appear even that it would have been any great favor to Broderick for Holstlaw to vote for Mr. LORIMER. Broderick was not active for Mr. LORIMER. He was not electioneering for him, participating in meetings, soliciting support, or doing other work in his behalf. He was not connected with the activities of the Lorimer forces, and it does not appear that it was a matter of consequence to him whether Mr. LORIMER was elected or not. He does not seem to have been in any confidential relations with the Lorimer leaders at any time or to have cooperated with the forces making for their triumph. So far as the testimony shows, Broderick was no more a friend and supporter of Mr. LORIMER than Holstlaw was at any time, except that the former had known Mr. LORIMER longer. The morning of the election Broderick told Mr. LORIMER that he "would be with" him when Mr. LORIMER told him, "I think I am going to win to-day." Broderick voted for 20 or 30 Democrats in the course of the balloting, and voted for Mr. LORIMER on the last ballot. He said before that he would vote for Mr. LORIMER for Senator, and his reasons (p. 3910) are given in answer to the question:

What was it that induced you to vote for Mr. LORIMER that day?

Answer. Just friendship; that is all; knowing we had no chance to elect our Democratic candidate. If we had, I would not have voted for Mr. LORIMER. I knew there was no chance whatever to elect Stringer. Now, it was between Hopkins and LORIMER, and it was LORIMER for me.

Holtslaw talked with members of the legislature about voting for Mr. LORIMER (pp. 3018, 3085, 3086) and had said:

If I ever had an opportunity I would vote for him for Senator.

Holtslaw further says he—did not think very much about what Broderick said about the $2,500, because I intended to vote for him anyway, and that did not have any influence whatever with me. (Pp. 3019, 3085, 3086, 3087, 3116.)

Broderick says:

I do not remember that he told me that night (May 25) that he was going to vote for LORIMER. I did not tell him on that occasion that if he did, there would be $2,500 for him. No such conversation ever occurred. (Pp. 3912, 3938, 3939.)

One very peculiar thing is that while, according to Holtslaw, when he told Broderick he thought Mr. LORIMER would be elected and he was going to vote for him the next day, and Broderick had then said, "You are?" and he said, "Yes, sir," that then Broderick said, "If you want to vote that way, there is $2,500 for you"; and while he did not consider that a promise or an agreement, even as to the $2,500, why should there be two payments, aggregating $3,200, one in June and the other in August, if those payments had reference to the vote for Mr. LORIMER? Why should Broderick offer to pay Holtslaw to do what he had voluntarily determined to do? That money had no relation to the election of Senator.

If Broderick had the money, or could get it, he would not have promised it after Holstlaw told him he was going to vote as wanted, and he certainly would never have paid more than the sum promised.

Holtslaw has sworn to numerous contradictory statements regarding these transactions; Broderick persistently denied the payment of any money, and produced witnesses who appear to corroborate his version of what took place in his saloon when Holstlaw called, and the worst that can be claimed is that there is still uncovered truth regarding the matter—still mystery about what the payment of money to Holstlaw by Broderick was for—but we can not find it in consideration of Holstlaw's vote for Mr. LORIMER. Under the evidence it is impossible to conclude that if money was paid to Holstlaw, White, Beckemeyer, Luke, Link, Shephard, Blair, or any other member of the legislature, it was paid with Senator LORIMER's knowledge, consent, or subsequent acquiescence, or that of anyone for him or in his behalf. If such money was paid one can not be convinced from the whole evidence that it was consideration for a vote for Mr. LORIMER or that it had any real connection with the election of United States Senator.

THERE WAS NO CORRUPTION FUND.

Diligent inquiry has been made for many months to show money was distributed to members of the legislature, and search has been prosecuted for evidence to establish a connection between such disbursement and the election of Senator.

More or less persuasive proof was gathered tending to show that White, Beckemeyer, Luke, Link, and Holstlaw participated in disbursements of moneys after the legislature adjourned. Suspicion was cast upon Blair and Sheppard; Browne, Wilson, and Broderick, as distributors, were involved. To connect the transactions in which these men engaged with the election of Senator, exhaustive effort was made to show that a fund of $100,000 was raised and improperly used in accomplishing the election of Senator LORIMER. Such a fund, if raised, was not circulated about Springfield. No evidence could be found tending to show that any money was disbursed during the session of the legislature. There was some talk in a general way of corruption immediately before and after the election of Senator, but no witness could be found who could testify to the actual corrupt use of money at that time. If it could be proven that such a fund was raised, and if, later on, money appeared in the hands of supporters of Senator LORIMER under suspicious circumstances not accounted for, the inference might be drawn that he was elected by improper means which not only reflected upon his honor, as well as upon the Legislature of the State of Illinois, but rendered his election illegal. It became important, therefore, to show the first condition of such inference, to wit, that money had been raised to aid in or bring about his election.

This effort culminated and centered around what is designated as the Hines-Funk conversation, which took place in May, 1909, at the Union League Club in Chicago.

Let me say, before taking up that story, that the committee engaged at the outset competent and industrious counsel, learned in the law and energetic in search of facts, and the testimony of every person we could imagine might have had information concerning such a fund, if it had been raised or ever existed, was taken, and no trace of any such fund could be found anywhere. The conception of it originated with Mr. Funk, who advanced the idea to Mr. Kohlsaat by way of pretending to relate to him a conversation with Mr. Hines, had immediately after the election of Senator in May, 1909.

THE FUNK-HINES CONVERSATION.

That conversation is detailed by Mr. Funk at pages 544 and 545 of the proceedings. He says Mr. Hines, with whom his relations were "casual," not "confidential or intimate," came up to him and said, "Hello; you are just the man I was looking for," or "that I wanted to see. I want to see you a moment"; and after taking a seat on a couch in the lounging room on the main floor of the club Hines said, "Well, we put LORIMER over down at Springfield, but it cost us $100,000 to do it," or "about $100,000." He went on to explain that they had to act quickly when the time came, and did not have time to consult anybody, and he said, "So we put up the money. Now we are seeing some of our friends to get the matter fixed up."

Mr. Funk says he inquired how much he was getting from his different friends, and Mr. Hines said, "Well, we can only go to a few big people; but if about 10 of us would put up $10,000 apiece we would clean it up." Mr. Funk asked him why he came to him, and Mr. Hines said, "Because you are as much interested as anybody in having the right kind of a man in Washington." Mr. Funk then told him "We would have nothing to do with the matter * * * because we are not in that kind of business." Further on Mr. Funk says that "before he got through his talk" Mr. Hines said, "Just send the money to Ed Tilden." That was before Mr. Funk told him he would have nothing to do with it (p. 545). No other names were mentioned (p. 546). Mr. Funk was not surprised at such a statement or request. He regarded Mr. Hines as a "loose talker; a man quite inclined to boast of his achievements, quite disposed to be familiar on short acquaintance, and quite anxious for people to think he was a large factor in large matters" (p. 549). Mr. Hines emphatically denies that any such conversation took place, and he is corroborated by the witnesses Carney, Hall, and Baker, who were present and heard most of the conversation.

Two or three days afterwards (p. 550) Mr. Funk told Mr. McCormick and Mr. Randolph, the president and general counsel, respectively, of the International Harvester Co., of that conversation.

Some time after that, possibly a few months, he told Mr. Kohlsaat of this conversation, in strict confidence (p. 552). Mr. Funk was quite sure that occurred in the fall of 1909 (p. 553), then he fixed it after January, 1910. Mr. Kohlsaat was editor of the Record-Herald, which he became (p. 428) January 1, 1910, and Mr. Kohlsaat fixed the time of the conversation with Funk, in May, 1910, about a year after the Funk-Hines talk (p. 431). This conversation was confidential throughout—Mr. Kohlsaat is a stickler as to his word of honor not to violate a confidence, he says (p. 438). Yet he told the story, Funk's name and all, to three people—Mr. Lawson, Mr. Roosevelt, and his wife (p. 440). He told numerous people the whole story (p. 440), omitting names. He finally construed the confidential limitation to apply only to newspaper publication. The editorial of February 15, 1911, was published (p. 438), in which reference is made to "the $100,000 fund that was raised to pay for LORIMER's vote."

In the meantime, Mr. Kohlsaat had secretly communicated with Senators who were acting as judges in the case wherein the testimony had been closed and reported, and he had sat almost within hearing of the witnesses who had given that testimony under oath (p. 601), possessing the information imparted by Funk, without troubling to enlighten the committee or advise anyone looking for testimony at the time, except the counsel for the Tribune, who was acting as prosecutor, having assumed and undertaken on his own application to present the evidence, and who sacredly guarded the information and kept it from the committee.

Funk is positive he mentioned no names but Hines and Tilden to Kohlsaat (p. 598), but the latter says others were mentioned, to wit, Sullivan, Conway, and Weyerhaeuser (p. 436). There is direct conflict, it will be observed, between Funk and Kohlsaat on a number of details.

THE SECOND HINES-FUNK CONVERSATION.

Funk says he had a second conversation with Hines. The date he does not remember (p. 557). About 9 o'clock one morning Hines came to his office and "said he did not want me to misunderstand our talk the other day." He further says the first conversation was "shortly after the Senator was elected"—May 26, 1909. "And the next conversation was some time after the Record-Herald editorial." This was February 15, 1911, 21 months after the first conversation; and then he says Hines referred to "our talk of the other day."

Later on he said this conversation took place after he was introduced to Senator LORIMER in Washington in December, 1909 (p. 559). Yet Hines, he says, on or about February 15, 1911, alludes to a conversation which took place May 26, 1909, as "our talk the other day." Mr. Hines conclusively shows that he was not in Chicago between February 7 and March 5, 1911. He was in Washington (p. 864). He is corroborated by records. He denies positively that the alleged second conversation with Funk ever took place as Funk claims, or that there ever was any such conversation (pp. 862, 866, 872). It is plain that Funk attempts to support his testimony regarding the interview of May 27, 1909, by saying Hines called on him afterwards and endeavored to impress on his mind there was nothing improper mentioned in that conversation. Although he says Hines called at his place of business in an excited state and referred to "our conversation" of "the other day," he is unable to produce a single witness, any memoranda, or other evidence to sustain that statement, which is flatly denied by Mr. Hines.

Before the Helm committee April 5, 1911, and before the Senate special committee on June 26, 1911, Funk testified this second conversation took place shortly after the publication of the editorial in the Chicago Record-Herald of February 15, 1911, using the language in one instance as "a few days after the publication of the Record-Herald editorial"; in another instance, when the date of that editorial was stated as February 15, 1911, and he is asked, "When would you say that conversation was held?" he said, "I think it was a short time after that."

It developed by Mr. Hines's testimony, supported and confirmed in numerous ways, that he was not in Chicago from February 7, 1911, to March 5, 1911, and he could not have had any such conversation as stated by Funk.

Before the board of directors of the Union League Club on November 13, 1911, and January 2, 1912, Funk repudiated his sworn testimony before the two committees and fixed another and different date for that second conversation.

First, he now, after it had been clearly shown it could not have taken place at the time he had previously given, places it "a few months" after the conversation of May 27, 1909. He moved it back 16 months.

Then he has a "distinct recollection" that Hines's visit was a few days after an editorial in the Record-Herald of January 20, 1911.

He has, in his various accounts of this conversation, given the date of its occurrence all the way from a few days after May 27, 1909, through September and October, 1910; then prior to September, 1910; then a few days before or after February 15, 1911; then on or about January 20, 1911. So we have it, with equal positiveness, at about seven dates scattered over a period of little less than two years. That is the testimony upon which you are urged to condemn this election. Mr. Funk gives seven different dates covering a period of a little less than two years for that conversation.

Mr. Funk's memory is unreliable. Mr. Hines has been fortunate in not having to depend on his own memory entirely. His system of keeping records of his movements and his business files have enabled him to substantiate his version, and we are not left to decide between the given recollection of the two men alone. Mr. Hines has shown by evidence we can not disregard that this alleged second conversation did not take place. This was introduced and relied upon by Funk as giving support to his account of the first conversation, and with the support the whole structure falls.

He said he told Mr. Kohlsaat of the two conversations with Mr. Hines shortly after the second, and before the Burrows committee met in Chicago, which was September 8, 1910. The subject came up casually, and was discussed confidentially. On this point it is interesting to note what Mr. Kohlsaat said:

Mr. KOHLSAAT. I think it was a year ago last May that, on my way to the Chicago Club to lunch one day, I met Mr. Clarence S. Funk, the general manager of the International Harvester Co., on Jackson Boulevard near Wabash Avenue. I had not seen him for some time and we stopped and shook hands, and it was raining slightly, and we stepped into the doorway of the W. W. Kimball Piano Co. I have forgotten just how the conversation started on the Lorimer case, but he used some such expression as that money was used to buy that election; and I said: "How do you know it?" "Well," he says, "I feel very positive it was. I was asked myself for a contribution." I said: "Tell me about it." "Well," he said, "I do not want to get mixed up in this thing at all. I do not want to bring the company into it in any manner, shape, or form, so that I had better not say anything about it." I said: "I won't bring your name into it. You give me the information, and if I use it, I will keep your name absolutely confidential." And under that promise Mr. Funk told me that he had been approached by Edward Hines, who said that they had had a chance the closing days of the legislature to put over Senator LORIMER'S election; that it took $100,000 to do it; that they did not have time to go around and raise the money, so a few of them underwrote it, and they were now around seeing a few people to ask them to partially reimburse them for the money that they had spent to elect LORIMER.

Mr. MARBLE. Did he, in that conversation, say to you that Mr. Hines had mentioned any names of persons interested in that election?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. He told me that Mr. Hines had told him that Edward Tilden was interested in collecting the fund.

Mr. MARBLE. Did he report to you that Mr. Hines had mentioned any other names than Mr. Tilden?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. I do not know whether he said that Mr. Hines had told him some names or not. There were some names used at the time, but I never have given them out, because I do not want to bring anybody into disrepute unless there is some occasion for it.

The other names mentioned were Roger Sullivan, E. S. Conway, and "one of the Weyerhaeusers" (p. 436).

The editorial of February 15, 1911 (p. 438), was based on that conversation.

He told three people the story, giving Funk's name (p. 439), which he had promised not to do. These included Mr. Lawson, of the Daily News, "and it influenced his editorial policy during the entire period of the LORIMER investigation" (p. 440), and Theodore Roosevelt, who was then on his way to the Cheyenne celebration, about August 15 or 17, 1910, and who "stayed in Chicago about an hour and a half"—between trains—and he and Mr. Kohlsaat "took a drive through the parks" (p. 441).

Regarding Mr. Funk, Mr. Kohlsaat said their relations were not confidential or intimate; that he had known Mr. Funk five or six years; met him casually at times (p. 433). "I have not known him intimately. We do not mingle in the same circles in life. He is a much younger man than I. He is connected with a manufacturing company and my work is newspaper work. I go to the Chicago Club and have a great many friends there, and he does not belong to the Chicago Club," testified Mr. Kohlsaat.

He told the Funk story to many other people (p. 444), including Mr. Keeley, of the Tribune (p. 445).

Senator GAMBLE. And Mr. Keeley, during practically the entire progress of the investigation in Chicago, was there present with the attorney of the Chicago Tribune, and at that time, you say, he had this information, without the name?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Yes.

Senator KENYON. And many others had?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Yes.

Senator KENYON. Was it a matter of general talk around Chicago about the time the investigating committee were there?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. I do not think so. I did not hear it discussed.

Senator GAMBLE. As a member of the committee, I may say that it never came to my knowledge, and never was suggested to me by any member of the committee.

Mr. MARBLE. I think it is not suggested in the old record by any person whatever.

Senator GAMBLE. Not at all

Mr. HANECY. I know it is not.

Senator LEA. Mr. Keeley had no information that he could have imparted without placing you in an embarrassing position before the committee?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. He could not possibly give it out. It would have been a very great breach to bring the name of my friend in.

Senator JONES. You talked freely, I understood, about this matter, except that you did not disclose the name?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Yes.

Senator GAMBLE. First, I will put it supposing that you were not an editor, and I made such disclosures to you. Are we not in a position, both of us, of protecting criminals? And is there any obligation in morals or in ethics requiring that you should protect me in that, and deny the public information that they ought to have? I will dissociate you from the editorship in that question.

Mr. KOHLSAAT. I do not see how I can dissociate myself from the editorship, because this came to me as the editor of a newspaper.

Senator GAMBLE. Suppose I make the same disclosure to Senator Jones, for instance.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not use that as an editor when you were sitting around the table in the club and giving out the information?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Let me make it clear on that. I was not bound to any secrecy on the subject matter of the hundred thousand dollars; but I was bound to secrecy as to the name of my informant.

Then, why did he not tell the Burroughs committee about the hundred thousand dollars? That was not a confidential matter.

If I had been bound to secrecy on the entire information, it would have been absolutely valueless to me as the editor of a newspaper.

The CHAIRMAN. And the information you had was pure hearsay, was it not?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Mr. Funk told me.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; it was pure hearsay, as to the fact.

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. And yet you were sending out that fact, not only to Members of the United States Senate, but around the club, that it was the fact?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Yes.

What an admission—what a spectacle—going about making the most damaging statements as facts, as matters within his knowledge, when he knew it was only hearsay and that of doubtful character! Messrs. Funk, Kohlsaat, Lawson, and Keeley all had the information Funk claimed to have derived from Hines when the first committee was investigating this matter in Chicago, September, 1910, and none of them furnished it or suggested how it might be had to any member of that committee. This indicates they doubted if there was real foundation for the story, or it is a serious indictment of their good faith.

INFORMATION KEPT SECRET, BUT FOSTERS CONSPIRACY.

After the testimony closed and after the reports were filed and while debate was on, this editorial was published and was followed by correspondence with Senators, as detailed. Referring to this, the record shows (p. 442):

Senator FLETCHER. You mentioned the amount of the fund, did you, not only that he was asked to contribute $10,000, but the amount of the fund?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. The $100,000?

Senator FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. KOHLSAAT. Yes, sir.

Senator JOHNSTON. Did you confer with Mr. Funk after hearing from Senator ROOT and Senator LA FOLLETTE as to whether you could disclose the information?

Mr. KOHLSAAT. I telephoned Mr. Funk. That was the question, I think, that this gentleman asked here just a moment ago, about my asking if I had seen Mr. Funk again, and asked for a release. When I received this letter from Senator ROOT—the Senator wrote me a forceful letter—and he said:

"As you have read my speech, you will probably see that I have based a good deal of the reliability on your letter"—

Or words to that effect.

"Now, if you can get your friend to come down here and tell that conversation, it will have a great effect on this case."

At that same time I had telegrams from Senator LA FOLLETTE, who was trying to press me to give up the name of my informant on that editorial, and I sent him wires that I could not, that I was duty bound not to do it.

And I sent for Mr. Funk, telephoned him, and he came over to my office, and I showed him the telegrams and the letters, and I said, "You are the only man in the United States that can settle this question." He said, "Well, I do not see how I can do that. In the first place, it is simply my word against Hines, and it did not come to me as a private individual. It came to me as an officer and employee of this company, and I have no right to bring the company into this sort of publicity, and it would be very injurious to me to do it. If I were the only one concerned, I would not hesitate a second; but I do not feel that I have a right to do the other." I said, "All right, sir; my confidence is still good. I will not give them the names."

And I wrote Senator ROOT to that effect and telegraphed Senator LA FOLLETTE.

Here is a man giving this hearsay secretly, covertly, so it could not be met or answered in any way, to Senators who are passing judgment upon the case—giving it not merely as hearsay, but backing it up with his own assertion that it was true that $100,000 had been raised with which to elect LORIMER.

So we have Mr. Kohlsaat peddling this heresay, supporting it with his personal opinion that Funk had told the truth, and Hines had told him what he said and that was true—violating confidence which he avowed was a thing as sacred as a confession to a priest—withholding it from a committee then in search of the facts and putting it out in a covert way after the committee had made its report, but always when it could not be answered by those concerned, all the while posing as a guide in public morals and defender of the public good. Asked to account for this conduct he replies by boasting of his close relations with Presidents and on some occasion having been the trusted guardian of state secrets of great international importance!

The methods of the assassin of character are here matched with the disposition of the snob. The obsequious regulator of public affairs struts the stage along with the fawning sycophant in the presence of dignitaries. The result was the Tribune broke loose afresh. The News echoed its "editorial policy" in condemnation of the election. The Record-Herald joined in the chase, yelping corruption, pretending to have found a fresh scent, and although the leader, the Tribune, was not approved, it followed and encouraged the pack in the effort to "drive LORIMER out of politics in Illinois."

The Honeythunder press takes up the cry and dins in the ears of the public through the deep bass of the metropolitan journal, the cracked soprano of the less pretentious dailies, and the sharp, rasping tenor of the weekly, all in full cry, bent on the destruction of LORIMER.

The public is told that a dangerous man, a menace to society, pulling down the institutions of the country, is wielding power, and must be suppressed and disposed of.

To be specific, he has purchased a seat in that body which has to do with making laws for the people, and which some have designated the "Rich Man's Club." It is necessary to unseat this impossible man and protect the Government. How did he buy it? From the Legislature of Illinois. The people of Illinois elected to the legislature a lot of bribe takers to represent them. They sold their votes even as was done in the comitia just preceding the downfall of the Roman Republic, and this rich and powerful and wicked man bought or caused to be bought, or is the beneficiary of the purchase of the votes of the representatives of the people of that State.

So persistent and loud and far-reaching was this chorus of calumny that public opinion was manufactured, aroused, and directed to the extent, it is boldly proclaimed by those who began the crusade, that no man dare stand for sober, common justice to LORIMER. They boast that the men whose consciences and judgments required them to square their action with the truth, rather than with the spasm of prejudice and the terror of misguided clamor, have been driven from public life. They brazenly threaten that the popular will which they have created will expel from office every man who dares to act in this matter in accordance with the advice of Wolsey to Cromwell—

> Be just and fear not;
> Let all the end thou aims't at be thy country's,
> Thy God's and Truth's!

Why this poisoning of the public mind—this lashing into a frenzy the thought of the people? The humble, struggling Tribune—with its $10,000,000 of assets—must protect the plain people who are about to be despoiled against this "boss," because forsooth Funk confided to Kohlsaat that Hines told him that $100,000 had been used to elect LORIMER, and having once said the horse was 15 feet high, Funk must stick to it.

Funk did not give the conversation correctly and never expected to hear from it again:

Mr. HYNES. When you related this matter to Mr. Kohlsaat, did you repose the confidence in him as a personal friend?

Mr. FUNK. Yes.

Mr. HYNES. You do not remember, do you, whether he was editing a newspaper at the time or not?

Mr. FUNK. Why, I think he was.

Mr. HYNES. Was it as an editor or as an individual personal friend that you gave that matter to him?

Mr. FUNK. I talked to him as a friend, not as a newspaper man.

Mr. HYNES. Did you expect him to use it in the press?

Mr. FUNK. No, sir.

Mr. HYNES. Did you expect him to tell it to anybody?

Mr. FUNK. No, sir.

Mr. HYNES. Did not you confine your injunction to him to keep it confidential simply to the suppression of your name?

Mr. FUNK. I regarded the whole matter as confidential.

So you have Funk and Kohlsaat at cross purposes regarding that conversation:

Mr. HYNES. Both the name of Mr. Hines——

Mr. FUNK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HYNES. And Mr. Tilden—oh, you do not remember mentioning Mr. Tilden's name?

Mr. FUNK. I do not think I did. I regarded the whole communication as confidential.

Mr. HYNES. Did you know that he was telling it around in the clubs?

Mr. FUNK. No, sir.

This is Funk telling about that conversation with Kohlsaat, and he does not remember the whole conversation as Mr. Kohlsaat gives it, either:

Mr. HYNES. Do you remember how the names of Roger Sullivan and Mr. Conway and Mr. Weyerhaeuser got into conversation between you and Mr. Kohlsaat?

Mr. FUNK. No; I do not. There was not anything to my knowledge that would justify the bringing of those names into conversation, and I do not recall they were brought in. I have read Mr. Kohlsaat's evidence as it appeared in the paper.

Mr. HYNES. He says that you brought it in.

Mr. FUNK. I think he has confused me with some one else in that gossip.

Gossip! That is just what it was—gossip. And upon gossip the Senate of the United States proceeds here with a special committee for months and months, at enormous expense, to open up a case once decided by it! And that gossip is in dispute between the men who engaged in it.

Senator GAMBLE. As I understand, you have no recollection of the names of Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Weyerhaeuser and Mr. Conway being mentioned as between you and Mr. Kohlsaat respecting the suggestion or otherwise?

Mr. FUNK. No; I have not. It is my best recollection that those names were not mentioned in my conversation. I think there were some other conversations.

So while Kohlsaat communicates these matters as of his personal knowledge to Senators, and then about the club, and bases his action upon them, Funk says he did not tell to Kohlsaat the things Kohlsaat says he did. Kohlsaat says he mentioned the names of these other men, and Funk absolutely denies it.

It is singular that Messrs. Tilden, Sullivan, and Conway never heard of any money being raised or contributed. If Hines was collecting funds to reimburse them or those who furnished money in the election, was it not peculiar that he stopped with Funk? Hines's talk with Funk terminated pleasantly—why did not he approach these other men or some other man on the subject? He only proposed to have Funk contribute a portion, and he was to see some nine others, according to Funk, and get the remainder. Hines's efforts seem to have ended with Funk. Not one of the other nine ever heard of the matter. Yet there was nothing to warn or caution him in what Funk said.

The whole story is absurd. Hines had a bare acquaintance with Funk, and no one can fail to give him credit for having more sense than to solicit a contribution to a corruption fund from him, under the circumstances and conditions as they existed. Funk was as positive that Hines was active down at Springfield as he is about the substance of that conversation, but the fact is Hines had not been in Springfield for three years before or two years after the election of Senator in 1909 (pp. 544, 595).

EFFORTS TO FIND THE FUND AND THE RESULT.

It was sought to locate the source of some such fund, and at great expense expert accountants were employed to thoroughly investigate the books of all parties who might have been connected with it if any ever existed.

I need only refer to the report of the experts, as follows:

To further determine the question whether Mr. Hines had been a contributor to or had any part in it, and whether Mr. Tilden had received or disbursed the same, the committee employed the firm of Barrow, Wade, Guthrie & Co., certified public accountants, of New York. Mr. Ritchie, of that firm, made an examination of the accounts of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. and all its subsidiary branches and of the companies controlled by it, including the North Wisconsin Lumber & Manufacturing Co.; Hayward Mercantile Co.; First National Bank, Hayward, Wis.; Mason State Bank, Mason; White River Lumber Co.; Iron River Lumber Co.; Virginia & Rainy Lake Co., covering the period from April 1, 1909, to December 31, 1909, as well as the personal books of Edward Hines for the year ending December 31, 1909, and reported to the committee as follows:

"(a) That there was no evidence of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. or any of its subsidiary or controlled companies having received or disbursed any moneys in connection with the election of Mr. WILLIAM LORIMER, on May 26, 1909, to the United States Senate from the State of Illinois.

"(b) That there was no evidence of Mr. Edward Hines as an individual having received or disbursed any moneys in connection with the aforesaid election.

"In order to ascertain whether or not Mr. Hines might have negotiated a loan from one or other of the banks in Chicago with which he was connected, or with which he had business relations, I visited the following banks and trust companies: Continental National Bank, Hibernian Banking Association, Fort Dearborn National Bank, Northern Trust Co., Corn Exchange National Bank, Metropolitan Trust & Savings Bank.

"At each of these banks I examined their record of notes discounted during the last week in May, 1909, and the first part of June, 1909.

"I am able to report, therefore, that at none of these banks, in the period under review, did Mr. Hines discount any note or notes, either as drawer or as indorser."

An examination was also made of the books of Mr. Edward Tilden, and after reciting the method of the same and the theory upon which it was conducted, Mr. Ritchie reported to the committee that—

"There was no evidence that Mr. Tilden had been custodian of the fund, alleged to have been raised in connection with the election of Mr. WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate from the State of Illinois. (6233.)"

WILLIAM M. BURGESS—HIS TESTIMONY FALSE.

The Funk story is sought to be reenforced by the testimony of William M. Burgess, a resident of Duluth, who testified to the effect that he boarded a train from Duluth to Virginia City, 73 miles, 10 minutes before it started, about 7.10 o'clock p. m., March 8, 1911, and in the smoking room of the Pullman had a conversation with C. F. Wiehe, the brother-in-law of Edward Hines, and secretary of the Hines Lumber Co., about an hour after the train left Duluth. In this compartment at various times during the trip were Messrs. Johnson, Cusson, F. J. Weyerhaeuser, Harper, and R. Weyerhaeuser, and a gentleman from Canada (pp. 1334 and 1335).

At the time of the conversation he says Wiehe, sitting on the leather seat running crosswise the car, in the corner next to the aisle, and the young Canadian, on the same seat next to the window, and himself, in a chair "crosswise" from Wiehe (p. 1335), 3 or 4 feet away, were in the compartment.

As Mr. John Weyerhaeuser left the compartment, Burgess inquired of Wiehe who he was, and he does not "remember how the conversation drifted over onto LORIMER's election," but Wiehe said that LORIMER had not spent any of his own money for his election, but, he stated, "there was, as he called it, a jack pot raised for Mr. LORIMER's election. I know what I am talking about, because I subscribed $10,000 to it myself" (p. 1336). "He said there was a jack pot of $100,000" (p. 1337). The conversation lasted probably 20 minutes.

At another time, on cross-examination, the witness said "Mr. Weyerhaeuser sat in the corner and Mr. Wiehe next to him"; then came John Weyerhaeuser, and then the Canadian (p. 1350). Johnson sat opposite the Canadian in a chair. Cusson sat forward of Burgess, next the entrance (p. 1351).

Rudolph Weyerhaeuser and Mr. Harper came in "and stood up against the washbowls" (p. 1351) about 10 minutes. Cusson was there about three-quarters of an hour—"followed me [Burgess] in" (p. 1352). John Weyerhaeuser was there when Burgess entered (p. 1354); Johnson was in the corner. Thinks the man from Canada was there also. All left but himself, Wiehe, and the Canadian, John Weyerhaeuser leaving last (p. 1335).

BURGESS CONTRADICTED BY ALL THE WITNESSES.

B. A. Johnson was in the smoking compartment until after Wiehe left (pp. 1523, 1534, and 1543), and he swears positively no such conversation as Burgess testified to occurred while he was there; that nothing was said about the Lorimer election; that the name of Father Greene was not mentioned (p. 1524).

John B. Price, of Seattle, came into the smoker 10 or 15 minutes after leaving Duluth, and there were in the smoker then McGowan, Johnson, and Burgess (p. 1559).

He was there all the while until after Wiehe left, except for a space of a minute or two, when he went into the body of the car to see about his grip (p. 1551), and so forth.

He is equally positive that nothing was said about Father Greene (p. 1553) and nothing was said about the election of Mr. LORIMER (pp. 1553, 1583).

No attempt was made to impeach these disinterested witnesses.

Charles McGowan testified, as did Price and Johnson, and he was in the smoking compartment every minute from Duluth to Virginia City.

S. J. Cusson (pp. 1606, 1607) went into the compartment about 20 minutes after leaving Duluth, and remained in it until Virginia was announced. He says Johnson never left until after Wiehe did, and that nothing was said about the election of LORIMER (pp. 1606, 1607, 1604).

Here are four witnesses, beside Mr. Wiehe, who flatly contradict Burgess. Mr. Wiehe swears he made no contribution to any LORIMER corruption fund (p. 1675), and had no conversation with Burgess in respect to Mr. LORIMER's election (pp. 1643, 1760).

Aside from the improbability of such an occurrence and Mr. Wiehe's emphatic denial, the testimony of the occupants of the smoker leave no room for doubt that the Burgess story is a mendacious fabrication out of the whole cloth.

W. H. COOK—HIS TESTIMONY WORTHLESS.

Burgess and Wirt H. Cook were good friends and joint conspirators. The latter was prompted by personal enmity toward Edward Hines, and his bearing on the witness stand, manner of testifying, and general appearance confirm the only reasonable conclusion that he was desirous of injuring Mr. Hines, and he maliciously invented the telephone conversation which he says took place in his room at the Grand Pacific Hotel, May 26, 1909.

Mr. Hines's account of that conversation is borne out by his records, his relations to the whole matter, all the circumstances surrounding it, and by the testimony, too, of the others then present, Messrs. Baker, O'Brien, and Wiehe.

No fair-minded, reasonable person can find any place to stand in defense of Cooks' extraordinary illusions about that conversation. It is difficult to see how any extension of charity can relieve him from the guilt of deliberate, willful exaggeration and false swearing.

Funk, Burgess, and Cook, sons of Belial, relied on to establish the corruption fund, have made a miserable, discreditable failure. Each of them stands alone in his specialty. Each, unsupported by any sort of corroboration, testified to conversations which, it so happens, from three to four witnesses in each instance testified never occurred. They undertook to rear structures on the sand of their own imagination or malicious, vindictive falsehood, which crumbled away under the test of truth. What a spectacle in civilized society, that the good name of reputable citizens can be smirched, the reputation of a faithful public official can be well-nigh wrecked, and he financially impoverished, disgrace heaped upon him, the fame of a great State blackened and her people and representatives humiliated by such flimsy, false, and dastardly concocted stories as these three severally related. In each instance there were witnesses present no one of whom corroborated the story given by either Funk, Burgess, or Cook; but, to the contrary, every witness on each occasion contradicted these star performers. There was no such fund raised or contemplated, and therefore there could have been no discussion of it.

What a colossal top was started spinning on that feeble support, and what a deserved and dismal collapse followed its unbalancing!

UNREASONABLE TO ATTACH CORRUPT MOTIVES TO HINES'S ACTIVITIES.

The contention is Edward Hines was sent on a special mission by those looking out for "special interests" to do more than carry a message to LORIMER. The latter already knew the President and leading regular or stand-pat Republicans were favorable to his election. The promoters of privilege, it is claimed, whom Hines represented, were rushing him to Springfield because LORIMER'S vote was needed in the Senate—according to the argument made by the Senator from Indiana.

This is not unlike most of the leaps and bounds logic is made to take by those supporting this resolution, and involves violent assumptions frequently resorted to in the effort to make plausible a conclusion reached in advance of the argument.

The Republican majority in the Senate was ample at all times and on every schedule to write the tariff law as it saw fit. There never was a time when the stand-pat Republicans needed Mr. LORIMER'S vote. His vote was of greater consequence in the House he was then a Member of than in the Senate. The record will show that the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act had a larger majority in the Senate than it had in the House on the final vote agreeing to the conference report. There was a margin of only 12 votes in the House. The alleged "special interests," the "powers of privilege," if they needed Mr. LORIMER, needed him most where he was.

Here is the way the record stands on the Payne-Aldrich bill, Sixty-first Congress, first session:

April 9, 1909. Passed House, 217 yeas and 161 nays; 9 did not vote. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1301.)
July 8, 1909. Passed Senate, 45 yeas and 34 nays; 13 did not vote. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4316.)
July 31, 1909. House agrees to conference report, 195 yeas and 183 nays; 10 did not vote. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4755.)
August 5, 1909. Senate agrees to conference report, 47 yeas and 31 nays; 14 did not vote. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4949.)

IF VOTES WERE PURCHASABLE, WHY NOT BUY THEM FOR HOPKINS?

On the other hand, the contention proceeds upon the assumption that Hopkins was not satisfactory to "big business," "special privilege," "preferred interests," and the like. The fallacy of the suggestion that Hopkins was not a regular of the regulars and a standpatter of the standpats is overthrown by his entire past public record. Why should the powers in Washington, if Hines was the representative claimed, on the mission asserted, chosen to carry out their will, concern themselves in the selection of a Senator other than Hopkins? Surely, they could not improve on him. If a simon-pure, regular Republican—regular in all his connections and convictions—was needed, why should not Hopkins, the nominee at the primary, as well as a pronounced and unquestioned high protectionist, be the object of the "interests'" solicitude and assistance?

He filled all demands of the character indicated, and possessed the added strength of being the primary choice and already in the Senate when the legislature met.

If it be said he was not popular with the Democrats, I grant it; indeed, I will say he was most unpopular with them. He was abhorrent to many of them. I will admit this was not the case with Mr. LORIMER.

If by this you mean it would have been difficult to get Democrats to vote for Hopkins, I agree again, but you have proceeded upon the idea that this was a matter of dollars and cents, and if so, sentiment played an insignificant part. In that situation, if votes were to be purchased, why not buy them for Hopkins?

If you say Democrats could have been bought for LORIMER, but not for Hopkins, I reply that my mind does not grasp the premise that only the Democrats in that legislature were vile. I decline to follow you into the position that Democrats were purchasable, but the Republicans were incorruptible.

There were enough Republicans in that legislature to elect Hopkins and have 50 to spare.

If Hines was the boodle carrier and the money changer for the "special interests," bent on the corrupt election of a Senator of the high-protection, stand-pat variety, instead of buying Democrats to vote for LORIMER, his business sagacity stood him in miserable stead, and the judgment of his advisers was weaker than it is reputed to have been, when he overlooked the bargain counter of 7 Republicans needed to elect Hopkins, or 7 Democrats for that matter. Hopkins received 95 votes and only needed 7 more. I will not admit—I can not follow in my mind the reasoning which prompts the inference that Democrats were purchasable, but Republicans were not, any more than I can the suggestion that LORIMER was a good Republican in the estimation of the regulars of that party, but Hopkins was not. Nor can I quite grasp the idea raised that Hines, as special representatives of "special interests," was dispatched to Springfield to corrupt the legislature and bring about LORIMER'S election by the use of money, and yet was so derelict in performing that mission as to stop in Chicago, while the legislature, ready to be corrupted, pulled off the election in his absence. Such thoughtless, careless conduct when Hines was known to be within six hours and on his way, and hungry Democrats had waited for months for money bags to appear, scarcely comports with the reputation given them.

What was shrewd, wide-awake Lee O'Neil Browne thinking of? What negligence for Browne and Tippit to deliver the goods—53 Democratic votes—without seeing the money. In all seriousness I ask, What interest could have been subserved by LORIMER'S election that would not have been subserved by the election of Hopkins?

What was the occasion for pouring in money to elect LORIMER?

The fact that Democrats voted for LORIMER rather evidences the absence of any purchasing of votes than otherwise.

It was conceded that the Democrats had no prospect or hope of electing a Democrat. Elected to the house were, Republicans 89, Democrats 64; to the senate, Republicans 38, Democrats 13; total, on joint ballot, Republicans 127, Democrats 77. A member of the house died in January and a member of the senate was absent on the ninety-fifth ballot, when 202 were present and voting and Mr. LORIMER received 108 votes. The view of the Democrats was that it was good politics to widen the breach in the Republican ranks, and make choice among Republicans of one with whom many were on terms of personal friendship as against a stalwart, bitter partisan whom the strongest of their number cordially disliked. The result was Democratic gains throughout the State in the elections that followed, thus vindicating their judgment.

INSULT TO MR. LORIMER ADVERTISED TO HIS INJURY.

And so the whole fabric of alleged new evidence tumbles. On it was built the attack of the newspapers, as before stated. On it was based the action of Theodore Roosevelt, a spectacular figure in public life then as now refusing, and publishing to the world his refusal, to sit at dinner given by the Hamilton Club in Chicago with Senator LORIMER, one of its members. Mr. Kohlsaat brought about that by repeating the gossip from Funk to the exemplar of purity in politics and high ideals in Government and good manners in society (p. 477). He could enjoy a luncheon with Booker Washington at the White House, but could not afford to dine in the same room with Mr. LORIMER, a member of the club of which he was a guest. He could not countenance sitting "at meat with publicans and sinners." This insult was grist to the mill of the Tribune, the News, and the Record-Herald, and was published from one end of the country to the other. The headquarters of morality did not know then and has not since taken the trouble to become acquainted with the facts; he depended on the hearsay information furnished by his friend Kohlsaat, setting forth the false allegation that $100,000 had been raised and used to elect Mr. LORIMER. The damning of a respectable citizen, the head of a "beautiful family," as Kohlsaat states, the representative of a State in high office, was a welcome thing if it gave opportunity to attitudinize as the standard of honor and righteousness and the paragon of civic virtue. He is the man aspiring for the highest honors of the country who, on his flamboyant arrival in Chicago on the 15th of last month, engaged in frantic efforts to nominate himself for a third term, made a speech in which he denounced his opponents on the Republican national committee as "tolerating robbery" and being guilty of "brazen theft," and defined the issue as "a fight between the rank and file plain people and corrupt politicians and thieves." You would have thought there was bound to be enough slaughtering to satisfy the blood lust of the most fiery Democrat, but it turned out there was not enough gore letting to supply the exigencies of a French duel. Some of these traducers and defamers would do well to study Mr. LORIMER'S life and strive to approach, as he can, the ideals of Kipling—

If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
If you can walk with kings nor lose the common touch;
If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
If all men count with you, but none too much;
If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run;
Yours is the earth, and everything that's in it,
And, which is more, you'll be a man, my son.

WILLIAM LORIMER THE MAN.

Who is this wicked man assailed in public print and on platform as one who profits by the shame and disgrace of a State, as the beneficiary of corruption in its legislature, the conscienceless machine boss, at once the high priest of special privilege and the ruler of the dive keepers, ward heelers, and political parasites? Everyone here knows this picture is libellous.

He is no stranger in Illinois, where he grew to manhood, hampered by a grinding poverty and crushing responsibilities, beginning with his childhood; unable to enjoy a day's attendance in the public schools he toiled early and late, doing what he best could to help provide for a widowed mother and younger children, never faltering in his devotion to them, and always, as he grew to manhood, conducting himself in an upright, honorable manner. He was sober, industrious, moral, and faithful in every undertaking. These qualities became fixed in the man. They were not merely spasmodic, occasional, or emotional. They became habits of life. The practice of truth and honor was not a mere sentiment, but became a rule of conduct. His energy and abilities and character thus formed won for him influence and place in local affairs and then in the broader governmental fields.

They say he is a "boss" and "undesirable." The distinction between a "boss" and a "leader" is sometimes confused. Whether the leader of a "bolt" is a leader of the people or a "boss" in the real sense may give some trouble to determine. The methods of Mr. LORIMER appear to have been that instead of answering in the newspapers the charges and criticisms hurled against him he calls the people together and personally and directly and frankly lays the whole question before them. He openly takes the people into his full and unrestricted confidence. Instead of conniving and conspiring with a selected few job hunters in some dark room and secretly forming plans and schemes to trick and deceive the people, or colluding with a few powerful and influential men who wish to control political affairs in their own way, assuming that they know what is best for the people, so many of whom they hold are too ignorant and so many of whom they regard as too lacking in honor and principle as well as in intelligence and patriotism to be trusted, he spurns such a course and assembles the people en masse and discusses fully the questions involved and submits to them the procedure desired.

WILLIAM LORIMER, THE OFFICIAL.

Since 1894, when he was first elected to Congress, he has moved in and out these premises, attending to his duties in his quiet, unassuming, democratic way. Reelected six times from a normally Democratic district, proving his efficiency, he has taken his cause on every occasion straight to the people of his district, and refused to bow the knee to the domination of influences dictated by violently antagonistic newspapers.

This refusal is unforgivable. The even tenor of his way did not suit powerful forces in his own party, which sought that control in public affairs they could not obtain without making way with him.

Let his open, avowed enemies speak. "The Tribune has always opposed Senator LORIMER" * * * (1897)—its policy has been "to drive WILLIAM LORIMER out of politics in Chicago and Illinois," says, on his oath, Mr. Keeley, its general manager and editor (p. 2053). Mr. Keeley was perfectly frank and unambiguous in his statements to the committee. Mr. Kohlsaat swore he had opposed Mr. LORIMER for 20 years (p. 428). Two days after his election, May 28, 1909, the Tribune said, editorially (p. 1880):

The Illinois Senatorial contest is over, and the result needs no extended discussion. The Tribune can not approve it, but without regard to the personality of the new Senator elect.

* * * * * * *

That he has been elected largely by Democratic votes does not in itself disturb the Tribune.

That seems to be about the only thing that is disturbing certain Members of the Senate. It did not disturb the Tribune the day after the election.

That he has been elected largely by Democratic votes does not in itself disturb the Tribune. The Tribune will usually welcome the support of Democratic votes for Republican candidates, whether voting for Republican Senator or a Republican President. The discontent of this paper relates to the Republican legislators and Republican leaders who have seen fit to ignore the results of a primary that ought fairly and justly to have been held binding.

That was the gravamen of the complaint. There was no charge of corruption, purchase of votes, or selling out of Democrats. The Tribune said the day after the election that the Republicans ought to have stood by the primary choice. That was its criticism.

The forty-sixth general assembly, it may be remarked in this connection, has been exceptionally fertile in mistakes, and it would be well if its members should devote the two remaining days of this demoralized session to the enactment of some of the meritorious measures that have thus far escaped the legislative wastebasket. This suggestion is especially worthy of the prompt consideration of those leaders who have proved their control of the operations of the assembly so conclusively in the election of Mr. LORIMER.

Respecting the new Senator elect, the Tribune hardly will be accused of undue favoritism. It has been aggressive and thoroughgoing in its opposition to him at many points of his career. At the same time it recognizes his many merits. No one questions his ability. In many respects he is an able, efficient Congressman. What the Tribune wishes to see him become is more of a statesman and less of a boss politician.

That is the editorial of the Tribune the day after that election.

Nearly a year passed by before the Tribune's opportunity came, in the shape of the White story, to reassert its old-time enmity.

Mr. Kohlsaat said regarding Mr. LORIMER, "From all I know, as I said before, his home life, his family life, is ideal. He has a beautiful family of children, which he has raised splendidly" (p. 429).

It is somewhat difficult to reconcile this estimate of a man—by his enemies—with a charge that he has purchased a seat in the United States Senate.

It ought to count for something that a man's private life is absolutely clean, his habits in the highest degree commendable, his associations without possible criticism, his truthfulness and honesty unquestioned, his ability recognized, his home brought in close relation with his church affiliations—the type of the God-fearing citizen.

The testimony of political adversaries is illustrated by that of Mr. Lawrence B. Stringer, the Democratic candidate for governor in 1904, and the Democratic primary nominee for United States Senator in 1908, and who was present in Springfield as the Democratic candidate during the contest of 1909, who told this committee—and this man's statement of a fact is conclusive, to my mind—that he had never heard Mr. LORIMER'S honesty and integrity as a man questioned, but, on the contrary, had heard it spoken of very highly, and "that when he made a promise you could rely upon it" (p. 2327). I need not refer to the evidence of friends on that point. Now, what I wish to emphasize is: I am not one of those who believe that a man may rob and steal until he arrives at his deathbed and immediately before dissolution profess religion and thereby secure for his soul the same situation as if he had lived a correct life. Nor, on the other hand, do I believe a man who has grown to past middle life developing and building a good character, quickening his sense of honor, intensifying his hatred of wrong, and exalting his hopes for humankind, will turn to bribing legislators or authorizing or consenting to such bribery or accepting or holding what may be produced thereby. To a man whose character is sound, whose habits of thought and feeling are well formed, the judgment of the hereafter is of more consequence than any prize the State or Nation can offer. Character is said to be "the one indestructible material in destiny's fierce crucible."

I feel convinced that WILLIAM LORIMER would not stoop to the vulgar, disreputable business of purchasing votes, the debauching of a legislature, nor would he permit such a thing in his behalf, nor would he accept the alleged benefits of such corruption, and if, afterwards, it was shown, or he believed, an office had come to him tainted, even without his knowledge, by such villainy, he would surrender it the instant that situation arose.

WE CAN NOT CONSIDER WHETHER OUR POSITION IS THE POPULAR ONE.

I realize the view I am compelled to take in this matter is not the popular one, and no one believes more fully in the correctness and soundness of the judgment of all the people than I do, when they know the facts. In this case they could not read and study this testimony of over 8,000 pages. They have been misinformed by glaring headlines and prejudiced and unenlightened expressions in the newspapers.

I realize that some of these have repeatedly warned Senators that if they voted in favor of Mr. LORIMER holding his seat as a Senator from the Commonwealth of Illinois, to which the legislature of the State, in the regular manner prescribed by law, elected him, they would be retired to private life. Threats have been made of dire consequences, but I apprehend no Senator will be diverted from a conscientious discharge of his duty by methods of that kind. They have gone so far as to claim that a number of Senators have already been defeated by reason of their votes in this case on March 3, 1910, and give names, the fact not stated being some of them have died, others were not candidates, and others were succeeded by new Senators by reason of a change in the party majority in the legislatures of their States, and they forget to mention the numerous changes of like character which have taken place among those who voted for the resolution to declare the election invalid.

It would be worse than base to consider such motives as would be prompted by these suggestions. As late as June 10, scarcely a month ago, one of these newspapers published an editorial, mentioned by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] on Saturday, entitled "Going down with LORIMER," and concluded it with "How many other United States Senators will sign their political death warrants on July 6 next?"

The Senator from North Dakota was sent this clipping, showing it had reached his State, and it contained the statement that in the senatorial race in Iowa Senator KENYON, who is against Mr. LORIMER, had won largely over his opponent, who, the inference was, favored Mr. LORIMER, whereas the fact is that opponent, Mr. Young, voted against Mr. LORIMER on the former hearing. They were not on opposite sides of that question at all. The same newspaper published an editorial on the 7th instant, yesterday, entitled "Vale Lorimer," in which this language appears:

> It is sincerely to be hoped he will not resign. Nothing would help more in the national task of cleaning the bosses and the cappers out of Congress than to compel one more line-up on this Lorimer issue.
> The people have uniformly wabbled right on LORIMER. It's like the business of stealing a nomination for President; they understand enough about it, without all the details, to get right.
> If LORIMER resigns, it will add to the difficulty of retiring a large number of Senators whose greatest service to the public could be rendered outside public life. If he sticks, and forces a vote, he will perform the one real service of his nauseous public career. He will be voted out, and that vote will line up, in full view of the community, the bunch of undesirable Senators and mark them for the slaughter that thus far has not missed any Lorimer supporter.

This is intended to threaten and intimidate, and if published concerning a case on trial in an ordinary court would be clearly in contempt of that court.

The reckless character of the statements in this newspaper, the misrepresentations and inveracities it indulges in, is indicated by the editorial in the adjoining column entitled "Stop thief the issue," containing this:

> In vain will politicians of both old parties endeavor to excite the people by the old battle cries and interest them in the old issues. The people have been awakened, as from a deep sleep, to a realization of the truth that they have been fighting among themselves over minor issues the while their Government has been filched from them by special privilege and bosses. They have awakened to a realization of the truth that among those who have been stealing control of the Government there are no such issues as tariff and currency and foreign policies, no Republican or Democratic Parties.
> At Chicago for the first time, and for the only time up to now, the powers that have undermined our system of representative government through adroit manipulation of the party system were forced into the open, and so great was their extremity that they had perforce to abandon their stealth and openly resort to plain, naked theft.

I wonder if the people of this country will take lessons in virtue and morality and patriotism from lawless instructors who would put over them a Diaz or a Castro.

There will be some people impressed, and, unfortunately, misled by such references to this case.

I do not forget that in Persia an individual poses as a god and Americans go all the way there to see him. They are credulous.

Louis XVI claimed that God made him King and he was responsible to no other authority. Public opinion allowed it until there was a collapse of public opinion—then the revolution.

Charlotte and Juan looked out their windows one evening and one half of Paris was butchering the other half—fanaticism.

I prefer the light that guides to the lightning that drives, the one who shows the way to the one who forces the way.

Let reason have sway and let us cling eternally to a correct sense of justice.

Is it possible that we have reached that point when it may be presumed that Senators, acting as judges in a case like this, are to be hampered, shackled, and cowed by the servile fear of the loss of position or of political support if they dare to do their duty?

We have heard much about the recall of judges, but here is the announcement of a doctrine which can only be likened to that humiliating travesty on the forms of judicial administration which would require the submission of the decisions of the judges upon the bench to the crowd on the courthouse steps.

So far as I am concerned, I do not believe sane people will take that position. If I felt it possible to allow considerations of the kind suggested to influence my action in this matter, I could find no cause for alarm concerning political support for the simple reason that the electors of Florida are intellectually of age. When that condition obtains everywhere, free government is beyond danger.

My people know it has been my duty to see and hear the witnesses, and to study and understand this evidence, and they believe I am capable of analyzing it and passing judgment upon it, and they believe I will do that without fear or favor.

They are sufficiently reasonable, furthermore, to grant that a man of ordinary intelligence who has read the testimony, and, especially, if he has also seen and heard the witnesses on the stand, is better qualified to determine what that testimony shows and arrive at the truth than a man, no matter how brilliant and exalted he may be, who has never read it.

I will not dwell on such threats because, of course, any Senator who would place his vote for or against this resolution on his calculation of its effect on his reelection is unworthy to be in a position to cast that vote at all—in this or any other case.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE OF ILLINOIS SENATE.

Comment has been made by the Senator from Indiana on the fact that Mr. Hines never gave his version of the conversation with Funk to the Helm committee or elsewhere until he testified before this committee. The fact is Mr. Hines was called before the Helm committee before Mr. Funk was and was questioned, and answered, flatly denying that he ever discussed the question of raising money to aid in the election of Senator LORIMER with anyone (pp. 32, 34, and 35).

Afterwards Mr. Kohlsaat and then Mr. Funk were summoned and Mr. Hines expected to be called regarding the conversation which had for the first time been introduced, but the Helm committee did not call him and shortly suspended the hearings because of inability to reach witnesses outside the State. That committee had received the affidavits of a special agent, M. B. Coan, setting forth what certain persons had told him, and it was well to discontinue that sort of testimony, because those parties were brought before this committee and swore that Coan's statements of what they said to him were absolutely false. Findings based on such testimony can not carry weight, and the resolution of the Illinois Senate may be thus explained. Mr. Hines had no opportunity to meet the testimony of Funk before the Helm committee.

Reference has been made to the testimony of Fred E. Sterling, giving conversations with Corcoran and some "general talk" regarding the use of money. He was for Hopkins, and had been told, "Mr. Hopkins appreciates what you have done for him, and if he is elected he will not forget you" (p. 5481).

He did not undertake to run down or make public what he had heard, and contented himself with reporting it to Senator Hopkins. The entire force and effect of his testimony is destroyed by the letter he wrote consequently, a few days after the election, to wit:

> THE REGISTER-GAZETTE (ESTABLISHED 1840),
> Rockford, Ill., May 28, 1909.
> Hon. WILLIAM LORIMER, Chicago, Ill.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: Please permit me to extend to you my sincere congratulations on the great personal triumph which you won in your election this week to the United States Senate. I believe you will make a great record in the upper branch of Congress and win over to your support many of those who have been against you in the past simply because they do not know you. I am glad I am not in this class. Because of personal obligations which Senator Hopkins placed me under months ago I could not honorably do other than give him my humble and feeble support. Inasmuch as it was impossible for him to win, I am glad the result was as it was, and hope your election will bring about harmony in the party in this State. I shall be glad to contribute my mite toward this end. I beg to inclose an editorial from to-night's Register-Gazette, to which I thought you might be interested. With deepest personal regards and best wishes, I remain,
> Very sincerely, F. E. STERLING.

Here is the man referred to and quoted in arguments here as sustaining the claim that there had been a corrupt use of money in the election of a Senator.

MR. LORIMER'S ELECTION APPROVED AT THE TIME.

In this connection, it is worth while to note some of the telegrams and letters sent to Mr. LORIMER at and about the time of his election, directing attention to but not stopping to quote them; their contents and authors are found in the hearings on pages 7554 to 7561, inclusive. The list includes:

Mr. John G. Shedd, president of the Marshall Field Co.;

Lloyd W. Bowers, Solicitor General, Department of Justice;

Joseph W. Fifer, one time governor of Illinois and member of Interstate Commerce Commission;

Charles G. Dawes, president of the Central Trust Co., of Illinois;

Adams A. Goodrich, one time judge and a prominent Democrat in Illinois;

John M. Harlan, son of the late justice of the Supreme Court and one time nominee for mayor of Chicago by the Republican convention;

Charles A. Wightman, treasurer of Evanston Democratic Club;

J. B. Harris and six others, Democrats, of Champaign County;

Francis C. Kelley, head of the Catholic Church Extension Society;

Samuel R. Robinoff, president and on behalf of the Jewish Political League of Chicago;

Frank D. Shuts, pastor of Court Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Rockford, Ill.; and

Robert S. Iles, of the law firm of Iles & Martin, Chicago, who said:

Your election is a consummation I have devoutly wished, and to find it realized is a personal gratification to me.

Your ability, eminent public service, and integrity entitle you to the honor, and your experience in the practical needs of the Nation and of the relation of Illinois to the Federal Union make you eminently the man of the hour and the most fitting representative Illinois could have at this time and for years to come (p. 7559).

This is a fair sample of the expressions contained in the voluntary letters and telegrams I have only stopped to mention. There were others, from the following:

Theodore Brentano, supreme court judge, Chicago;

John Gibbons, judge of circuit court of Cook County;

Richard S. Tuthill, judge of circuit court of Cook County;

W. N. Gemmill, judge of municipal court of Chicago;

Jesse A. Baldwin, now on the appellate court of Chicago;

M. F. Girten, judge of the municipal court of Chicago; and William G. Beale, one of the three trustees controlling the Tribune property (p. 7544).

REASON FOR OPPOSITION OF THE NEWSPAPERS.

The question may be asked, Why were certain newspapers so persistent in their bitter attacks? The record shows on that point the following:

Senator FLETCHER. Yesterday you said, Senator LORIMER, that the newspapers—I think you mentioned particularly the Tribune and the Record-Herald and the News—had been for 10 or 15 years endeavoring to drive you out of public life. Can you summarize the reasons for that and tell us why they pursued that course?

Senator LORIMER. The only reason I have been able to assign for it, Senator, is because I never have been much of a newspaper man. The newspapers have always wanted to run the Republican politics of our city and county and State, and I never have consulted the editors of the newspapers to find out whether or not I should do what I wanted to do. The time was when Joseph Medill absolutely controlled the affairs of the Republican Party in Cook County. Mr. Kohlsaat, when he bought the Inter-Ocean, aspired to divide the influence with him; and I got into a quarrel with him—or, rather, got into trouble with him, not into any quarrel—because I would not do the things he wanted to have done in politics.

Senator FLETCHER. Then, do you mean to give us to understand that the real reason of that opposition was that the newspapers could not control or dictate to you?

Senator LORIMER. That was it; yes.

NO MONEY WAS RECEIVED FOR VOTES FOR SENATOR.

The Senator from Indiana in his argument in this case indulged in many broad and general assertions which naturally led to inconsistencies, and by reason of the lack of specifications and detail were calculated to create an erroneous impression on the minds of those not thoroughly familiar with this record. An illustration of such generalization, wanting in accurate confine to the evidence, may be mentioned. He says, "Is it true that four men confessed to taking bribes, two of whom connected the bribe with the election of the Senator?" and answered "Yes." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 8423.)

On page 8427 he says, "* * * the four men who testified positively and without equivocation that there was jack-pot money received by them, and two testified with equal positiveness that they were paid money before that time by Senator LORIMER's accredited agent, Lee O'Neil Browne, in consideration of their vote in the senatorial election."

In one statement two of these men only connected the money received by them with the election of Senator; in the next breath four of them testified positively they were paid this money in consideration of their votes in the senatorial election. Which is correct? Neither. As will appear from the evidence only one man so testified—White—and he was thoroughly discredited.

We find such further expressions as "confessions of guilt came and the evidence of wholesale corruption piled mountain high," Democrats are denounced as "deserting miscreants." It is asserted that "men do not betray party or principle in that way under those circumstances save for money."

The circumstances given were: "This condition of things at Washington were such the reforms for which the Democratic Party had fought for 50 years might be defeated by that one vote that was about to be sent from Illinois." I have already shown that the record clearly establishes that it was not a question of one vote or ten.

I challenge any man to show by this testimony or otherwise that any four men or two men ever confessed or stated they were paid money "in consideration of their vote in the senatorial election."

I challenge any man to point out in this entire record where any man except White ever said he was paid any money or other thing of value in consideration of his vote for Mr. LORIMER.

I challenge any man to show by this record or otherwise that one vote from Illinois or elsewhere was needed to put through the Republican program at Washington in 1909, or to prevent the Democrats from accomplishing the reforms they had fought for.

Of course, the averment of the existence of "wholesale corruption" and that the evidence of corruption "piled mountain high" are rash conclusions, which ought to be fully answered by the failure to point out this "mountain-high" evidence.

WHITE CAN NOT BE BELIEVED.

As a matter of fact, there was no confession in any proper sense or correct use of the word. White's story was no confession. Practically a year after the election White conceived the idea of bettering his financial condition by preparing what he called his experience in the legislature, which, to make it yield anything, had to take the form of alleged exposure. He had in mind a plain, everyday, blackmailing scheme. He offered his effusion to Senator LORIMER on that basis. He endeavored to sell it to magazines, but the standing of the author was such no reputable publisher would take it without investigation. He knew of the bitter hostility of the Tribune to Senator LORIMER. At any rate, the suggestion was made to him that a market for his production might be found in that quarter. White knew of the attitude of the Tribune toward Mr. LORIMER. He knew he could never have got one dollar from the Tribune if it had dealt merely with a jack pot and did not connect it with the senatorial election. The story was not worth while unless it involved Senator LORIMER. White voted for him.

White had participated in the legislative jack pot, but unless this jackpot had to do with the election of Senator LORIMER there would be lacking the element of chief value. White was after the value, and he supplied the connecting link so far as his own testimony is concerned, but he, the Tribune, the detectives, the prosecuting officers, with all their threats and terrorizing combined, have not been able to show that any member of the legislature ever in an unguarded moment, or through reward, intimidation, fear, or duress, admitted he voted for Mr. LORIMER because of money paid or promised to him. It is sought to stimulate some reliance on White by claiming his is not an instance of original sin, but of subsequent downfall, which lamentable catastrophe happened when he got into politics. It is immaterial to this inquiry to determine more than that when he devised and sold his story he was steeped in iniquity, his conscience was "seared as with a hot iron," and he continued in that state up to the time he testified before this committee when he swore that he aspired to become a member of the legislature as a reformer and for the purpose of correcting the errors and preventing the crimes in the Illinois Legislature theretofore indulged in, and that he was actuated while a member by that same commendable purpose, to wit, to ferret out and expose corruption whenever and wherever he could find it. Prompted by this high aim, he accepted a bribe, kept the money, said nothing about it for nearly a year, and then told of it for more money. The record is full of evidence showing White's "grafting" propensities, and he was in position on committees and otherwise to share in any legislative jack pot. The only possible excuse for attempting a defense of White must be found in the knowledge that the charges here rest and depend on him. He confessed to numerous false statements and no reliance can be placed on anything he might say.

LEE O'NEIL BROWNE WAS NOT MR. LORIMER'S AGENT.

There is no evidence whatever that Lee O'Neil Browne ever was Mr. LORIMER's "accredited agent" in the sense that he was authorized to represent Mr. LORIMER in any negotiation, transaction, agreement, or arrangement looking to obtaining, procuring, or inducing votes for him.

Mr. LORIMER had no such agent, and all the evidence shows it. Therein the present record is more conclusive than the former.

Mr. LORIMER's own testimony completely demolishes any such suspicion.

Lee O'Neil Browne made no such claim. No witness testified to any such fact or to facts from which that might be reasonably inferred.

Mr. LORIMER positively denied that he had any such agent, "accredited" or otherwise.

It would scarcely be warranted to designate every friend and supporter of a candidate as the "accredited agent" of such candidate. This was the precise relation of Lee O'Neil Browne to Mr. LORIMER after he became a candidate.

ANNUAL JACK POT.

The "mountain-high" evidence simply shows the "wholesale corruption" to have been the plain, vulgar, graft kind, just as had existed for years in every Illinois Legislature. United States Senators are only elected every six years, but this scandal, talk, hold-up conduct, and paying in and receiving money to defeat or to pass bills appears to have been an annual affair.

Mr. Hinman, editor of the Inter Ocean (p. 205), gives that as his opinion and belief, and says "that common report has existed in fairly strong shape and for every legislature that has been in Illinois since I have been there—12 years."

Ex-Gov. Yates said: "The general subject of money being used to influence legislation or to procure the passage of legislation has been talked about" seriously and otherwise for 30 years (p. 220).

Mr. Stringer said:

Oh, I have heard rumors of money being used, perhaps, at times to influence legislation, but I have no concrete information along that line. I think the first time my attention was called to it was in connection with what was known as the Allen bill (p. 2295).

This was in 1897 or 1898.

Gov. Deneen gives the clearest idea and most graphic description of that condition (p. 1120). He says:

They wanted to get rid of me. I do not know that they wanted to send me to the Senate, but I felt sure that they wanted to get rid of me.

Senator KERN. And they were willing to pay that price to get rid of you?

Mr. DENEEN. They were willing to kick me upstairs or kick me downstairs, I think.

Senator JONES. Do you think they were promoting this conference that you referred to?

Mr. DENEEN. That would be purely a matter of inference. I would not want to say as to that. I have no evidence on the matter.

Senator JONES. The leaders of it were those who professed to be your friends, anyway?

Mr. DENEEN. There were leaders there who were very friendly to those interests who were very friendly to putting me out of office, or making me Senator. I do not know the relation between them and the men back of them.

Senator KENYON. Governor, was there any relationship between the interests that were trying to get rid of you and the "jack pot" we have heard about?

Mr. DENEEN. I thought so.

Senator KENYON. You did?

Mr. DENEEN. Yes, sir.

Senator KENYON. At the time of the passage of the local-option measure——

Mr. DENEEN. I do not mean to imply now that I am speaking of Senator LORIMER in this matter.

Senator KENYON. No. At the time of the passage of the local-option measure were the liquor interests very active in Illinois?

Mr. DENEEN. Very.

Senator KENYON. That was while you were governor?

Mr. DENEEN. While I was governor.

Senator KENYON. Was the "jack pot" in evidence at that time?

Mr. DENEEN. I think so. The general impression is that it was.

Senator KENYON. How long has this jack pot existed, to your knowledge?

Mr. DENEEN. Nobody knows exactly except those who participated in it; but the general understanding is that it began in 1897 with some "constructive legislation" with reference to the so-called Allen bill, the Humphrey bill, the gas-consolidation bill, the warehouse bill, and some "constructive legislation" that was passed at that session.

Senator KENYON. Did you regard these same interests that were trying to secure your election to the Senate, or were suggesting your election to the Senate, as contributors to the jack pot?

Mr. DENEEN. I do not know as to that. I could not tell.

Senator KENYON. Of course, you do not know because you did not see it.

Mr. DENEEN. No.

Senator KENYON. But you had a pretty general understanding of the situation there, apparently.

Mr. DENEEN. My information was that they contributed pretty heavily to the funds to defeat me. Whether they gave any to the legislature thereafter I do not know. Whether they expected men to vote from a sense of obligation for large donations at the primaries or elections or whether more substantial inducements were brought to bear I do not know.

Senator KENYON. You say Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne was understood to represent the liquor interests?

Mr. DENEEN. The liquor interests.

Senator KENYON. Was that the general understanding?

Mr. DENEEN. I think it was known everywhere. It was charged in the papers and mentioned during the contest.

Senator KENYON. Was it ever denied by him?

Mr. DENEEN. I never saw any denial. I do not know whether he denied it or not. I think it was generally understood.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you know about the jack pot in 1897, at the time the various bills you have spoken of were pending?

Mr. DENEEN. I was not a member of the legislature in 1897. I had been in the legislature four years before that, and only have such information as is public information as the matter has been charged.

The CHAIRMAN. Give us what you know about it.

Mr. DENEEN. The charge was made at that time that large amounts of money were distributed in the legislature to pass the so-called Allen bill, which would give the city councils in the State power to grant franchises for 50 years to certain public-utility companies.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom was the Allen bill supported?

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know whether I interrupted you when you were stating what you knew about the common report as to contributions to the fund of that year.

Mr. DENEEN. What fund? Do you mean 1897?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. DENEEN. I do not know at that time. I mentioned the funds against me in 1908, when I ran.

About the "jack pot," if you care to know, this is the general situation that obtained in our legislature for a number of sessions: The legislature meets in January and adjourns when it chooses. It can remain in session two years if it chooses. It has been the custom for several legislatures to defer the appointment of committees until the session has far advanced. Sometimes, I think, they have deferred it for eight weeks. The constitutions of some States limit the session to eight weeks, but in our State they hardly get organized for eight weeks. Then the bills are introduced, and they range in number from 800 to, I should think, 1,300 bills. They have about 60 committees. The minority agree upon a leader, and the majority elect a speaker, and the minority leader and the speaker arrange for the appointment of these committees and their chairmen. Then the committees meet and begin their work; and the bills that are introduced to regulate corporations—they are all regulated out there—are introduced and receive about the same consideration. They get through one house and get up to the second reading in the second house—the lower house usually, because they are more numerous in number—and the struggle then begins to get those bills to action and to prevent action. At that time the date of adjournment is fixed by joint resolution, and they pass most of the legislation.

For instance, in one of the legislatures that has been in session since I have been governor they passed about 235 or 240 bills. About 20 or 25 of those were passed the second day preceding the adjournment, and all the rest of them were passed in the last two days. When it gets up to the second day preceding adjournment, with a congested calendar, the speaker rules that a bill can not be heard unless it is on special order, and the special order requires a two-thirds vote. The constitutional provision is a majority vote. So that to get a bill up requires 102 votes, and to pass it requires 77 votes; and to prevent a bill getting advancement there are the men who are against it per se, and then all the men who fear that their bills will be ignored when other bills get up that will consume three or four hours. So it is impossible to advance anything without the speaker. Then those bills that are advanced, these "regulators," usually meet their fate on those two days, and as they meet time after time, are introduced, and are referred to the same class of committees, the general suspicion is that they could not bear the test of an exhaustive coroner's inquest. That is the suspicion. Then the general understanding in our State is that the money is paid, and that it accumulates in the hands of several men and is distributed according to the judgment of the men who control.

Senator FLETCHER. Is the "jack pot" opened at that critical moment, or later?

Mr. DENEEN. The general impression, the gossip, is that it is opened a considerable time later.

Senator KERN. It is done cautiously.

The CHAIRMAN. On what principle is it distributed, Governor?

Mr. DENEEN. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Who has the determining power?

Mr. DENEEN. The men who create the fund, who gather the fund, I assume.

The CHAIRMAN. The men who gather the fund—certain leaders?

Mr. DENEEN. That is the general impression—certain leaders; yes.

Senator KENYON. How much of a fund is that supposed to be at a session?

Mr. DENEEN. I never have heard, definitely.

Senator KENYON. You have heard rumors?

Mr. DENEEN. I have heard rumors and other matters, but I have never heard definitely. I do not know.

Senator JONES. Have you heard of those who contributed to the "jack pot" fund?

Mr. DENEEN. Only the general suspicion.

Senator JONES. You have heard the general suspicion?

Mr. DENEEN. Oh, yes; I have heard that.

Senator JONES. Who was it?

Mr. DENEEN. I have heard that the railroads have contributed for years to protect themselves against legislation; that the gas companies or gas company of Chicago, and the electric-light company, and the liquor interests, and the stockyards companies, and the elevator companies, I think, and the Pullman Co., and the street car companies have contributed.

Senator JONES. Has it been charged that those interests have pretty generally contributed to the legislature?

Mr. DENEEN. I would not say as to that. I do not know specifically enough. I know only the general running rumor. I do not know that it is based on facts at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the matter ever been investigated by the Legislature of Illinois?

Mr. DENEEN. There was an investigation made during the term of my predecessor, Gov. Yates, about the passage of the so-called Mueller bill that he referred to the other day, affecting Chicago; and the charge was made by Mr. Hinman, of the Inter Ocean, that the street railway companies were contributing money to promote that bill. They had an investigation of the matter at that time, and I think it was referred to the other day by the governor. I read his testimony.

Senator KENYON. Governor, have you ever made an investigation of these conditions yourself?

Mr. DENEEN. No; I have no power to make an investigation, and no facilities.

The testimony in this case, in so far as it touches upon the use of money and develops the dirty and disgraceful, shows the order of things dating back to 1897 has continued in that regard, and this rottenness had no relation to the senatorial election. It can not be held to invalidate every act of the legislature, especially action not legislative in character.

White is the only man who says he was promised money and paid it for his vote for Senator. White got money for that statement. Holstlaw, Beckemeyer, Luke, Link, Browne, Wilson, Broderick, Shephard, Blair, and every other witness under suspicion swore, when the question was put squarely, each for himself, that he cast his vote for Senator without any valuable consideration promised or paid in that behalf.

HOLSTLAW UNTRUSTWORTHY, AND THE SOURCE OF MONEY PAID HIM AND OTHERS LOCATED.

Holstlaw was indicted in Sangamon County for perjury growing out of his engaging in the sale of a furniture contract for the State, as a member of a legislative committee, for which he was to receive $1,500; and that indictment was dismissed, and he was granted immunity from prosecution when he stated Broderick said to him:

Mr. LORIMER is going to be elected to-morrow; there is $2,500 for you if you want to vote that way (p. 4759).

Holstlaw could not have gotten immunity from prosecution for perjury in connection with the furniture deal without bringing in Broderick and connecting that with the senatorial election. This was about May 9, 1909. The White story was published April 30. Holstlaw stated that he had made up his mind to vote for Mr. LORIMER before that alleged conversation with Broderick, but that was not put in his statement to the State's attorney. The idea was to connect with the senatorial election. This State senator could get off with perjury and boodling, provided he could help out the White story. Holstlaw testified that early in the evening before the election Broderick said to him: "Senator LORIMER will be elected to-morrow. I said, 'I think so, and I am going to vote for him.' He said, 'You are?' I said, 'Yes, sir.' He said, 'If you want to vote that way there is $2,500 for you.'" Broderick was indicted on this charge of Holstlaw, tried in Sangamon County, and acquitted. Broderick did pay Holstlaw not $2,500 only, but $2,500 on June 16, 1909, when he said, according to Holstlaw, "there would be more coming," and $700 on August 28, 1909, when he said "there is that money."

There is something wrong here. Is it believable that Broderick paid Holstlaw $2,500 a month after there was any need to pay him anything, and urged it on him at that? Is it believable that Broderick paid Holstlaw $700 more which he never had promised and Holstlaw had no reason to expect?

Holstlaw had stated repeatedly to members and others he intended to vote for Mr. LORIMER (pp. 3017, 3018, etc.). He swears that what Broderick said to him about the $2,500 "did not have any influence whatever" with him (p. 3019).

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Florida has now been speaking for two hours and a quarter and I am satisfied he does not feel like proceeding longer this afternoon. If he does, of course the Senate will be glad to hear him. If he does not, I will ask the Senate to take a recess.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have had a long session, beginning at 11 this morning; it is now a quarter after 5, and if Senators would like to take a recess I am certainly agreeable to that course.

Mr. BAILEY. It is not anything like the tax upon the Senate that it is upon the Senator. I know he has been here since 11 o'clock, and I know an address of 2 hours and 15 minutes under these circumstances is physical exhaustion. It was his own convenience that I was attempting to consult. If he desires to proceed, we shall be glad to hear him; otherwise——

Mr. FLETCHER. I appreciate the Senator's interruption. I would prefer to discontinue my remarks at this time, if agreeable to the Senate, and resume them in the morning.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Senator gives notice that he will resume the floor to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Florida does not wish to speak further to-day, I will move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment until I can submit an amendment and ask for its appropriate reference? It is morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not sure that under the unanimous-consent agreement other business can be received.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not examined the agreement. I was under the impression that bills could be introduced or amendments submitted as routine morning business. If I am mistaken about that, of course I will not attempt to violate the agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course, there is no call for morning business under such a proceeding.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senate never disabled itself from receiving bills, but I withdraw the request.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Monday, July 8) the Senate took a recess until Tuesday, July 9, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 8, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God and Father of us all, in whom we live and move and have our being, increase our faith and confidence in Thee, quicken our hopes and aspirations, comfort, we beseech Thee, the sorrowing, strengthen the weak, lift up the fallen, forgive the erring. Give light to those who sit in darkness, guide our wandering footsteps and make us faithful servants unto Thee and to our fellow men, that we may hallow Thy name. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 6, 1912, was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 6084) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION FROM THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

JUNE 13, 1912.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby resign my position as a member of the conference committee on the river and harbor bill.

Important business will necessitate my being absent from Washington for some time, and on this account I think it is best to take the above action.

Yours, very sincerely, J. H. DAVIDSON.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON] was appointed on this conference committee to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE]. Mr. DAVIDSON now resigns, and the Chair reappoints Mr. LAWRENCE, who has returned to the city.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 24565) with Senate amendments thereto, and disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not make that request until the bill has been printed with the Senate amendments. Let it lie on the Speaker's table for a day or two until the Senate amendments have been printed.

Mr. PADGETT. Will it be printed until some action has been taken or a request has been made?

Mr. MANN. It can be printed by order of the House.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request, and ask unanimous consent that the naval appropriation bill with Senate amendments thereto be printed to show the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, is that not necessarily done under the rules of the House?

Mr. PADGETT. Not unless some action is taken.

Mr. MANN. Under the rules it is not done as long as it remains on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not provide for printing. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REWARD FOR IMPROVEMENTS, ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 17937) authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvement or economy in manufacturing processes or plants, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON-OREGON CORPORATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad and for telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, with House amendments thereto.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the House amendments to the bill just laid before the House by the Speaker have been disagreed to and the Senate has asked for a conference. I move, therefore, that the conference be agreed to and the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KOPP.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 24565. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 353):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE R. MALBY, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

In compliance with the foregoing resolutions the President pro tempore appointed under the second resolution as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. ROOT, Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. BURNHAM, Mr. JONES, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. BACON, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. THORNTON, and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 20684. An act providing for the sale of the Lemhi School and Agency plant and lands on the former Lemhi Reservation in the State of Idaho.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 332. Joint resolution appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers for the Organized Militia.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I present to the House a privileged report on House resolution 524. It relates to charges made against Judge Robert W. Archbald. The committee has reached a unanimous conclusion. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, at this time to make any very lengthy statement in regard to this resolution or the report thereon. The report itself is very full. It starts with a statement as to the origin of this proceeding and gives a summary of the findings of facts and conclusions of law and conclusions respecting the conduct of this judge and recommends that the judge be impeached upon 13 separate articles of impeachment which are appended to the report. The committee gave more than a month's study to an investigation of charges against this judge and his conduct. We heard witnesses under oath; we took documentary testimony; we gave the fullest and most careful investigation to the subject; and I believe that the committee reached a correct conclusion in respect to the action that should be had toward this judge. At any rate the committee was of the opinion that this judge should be impeached for the reasons set forth in the report. With the indulgence of the House I shall read the conclusion and recommendations of the committee. The facts and law as found by the committee are set forth in the report, and I desire to call the attention of the House to the conclusions reached by the committee.

Judges "shall hold their offices during good behavior." Thus says the Constitution. The framers of that instrument were desirous of having an independent and incorruptible judiciary, but they never intended to provide that any judge should hold his office upon nonforfeitable life tenure. We sometimes hear it stated that a Federal judge holds his office for life. The most casual examination of the Constitution will convince any one that he holds it during good behavior. Those who formulated the organic law sought to protect the people against the malfeasance and misfeasance of unjust and corrupt judges. Therefore, they wisely limited the tenure of office to "during good behavior" and provided the remedy for misbehavoir to be forfeiture of office and the removal therefrom by impeachment. The conduct of this judge has been exceedingly reprehensible and in marked contrast with the high sense of judicial ethics and probity that generally characterizes the Federal judiciary. Be it said to the credit of the wisdom of our fathers and in behalf of our American institutions that the judges have, as a rule, deported themselves in such manner as to merit and keep the confidence of the people. The public respect for the judicial branch of our Government has almost amounted to reverence. This confidence has been deserved, and let us hope that it will continue to be deserved to the end that an upright and independent judiciary may be maintained for the perpetuation of our Government of law.

Now it might be said, Mr. Speaker, that if the remedy by an impeachment of a corrupt or unjust judge is not adequate, and it has sometimes been so argued in other cases, we know that the people will demand an adequate remedy to get rid of an unfaithful judge. I am of opinion that the remedy of impeachment is adequate and the House of Representatives has, I believe, in every case shown the willingness wherever proper to invoke the remedy of impeachment. Sometimes it has been said that another tribunal has not been as responsive to the public demands where an unjust or unfaithful judge was sought to be gotten rid of, but I believe that certainly now both branches of Congress, the House that inaugurates the impeachment and the Senate that tries it finally, are sufficiently responsive and sufficiently alive to the public necessity for the preservation of and for demonstrating the efficiency of the remedy of impeachment to apply it justly and properly in this case, according to the law and the facts. Of course, if the facts do not warrant the impeachment of this judge, he should not be impeached. Your committee is of the opinion that the facts do warrant his impeachment, and your committee is of the opinion that they can convince the Senate, when the witnesses are examined, that the facts will warrant the conviction of this judge and his removal from office. A judge should be the personification of integrity, of honor, and of uprightness in his daily walk and conversation. He should hold his exalted office and the administration of justice above the sordid desire to accumulate wealth by trading or trafficking with actual or probable litigants in his court. He should be free and unaffected by any bias born of avarice and unhampered by pecuniary or other improper obligations.

Your committee is of opinion that Judge Archbald's sense of moral responsibility has become deadened. He has prostituted his high office for personal profit. He has attempted by various transactions to commercialize his potentiality as judge. He has shown an overweening desire to make gainful bargains with parties having cases before him or likely to have cases before him. To accomplish this purpose he has not hesitated to use his official power and influence. He has degraded his high office and has destroyed the confidence of the public in his judicial integrity. He has forfeited the condition upon which he holds his commission and should be removed from office by impeachment.

Your committee reports herewith the accompanying resolution and articles of impeachment against Judge Robert W. Archbald, and recommends that they be adopted by the House and that they be presented to the Senate with a demand for the conviction and removal from office of said Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge designated as a member of the Commerce Court.

Following the report, Mr. Speaker, are the resolution and the articles of impeachment, which are attached to the report.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with this brief statement, which is no more than the conclusion reached by the committee, it has occurred to the committee that perhaps it would be proper to let the report be printed in to-day's RECORD, and that this resolution be called up for consideration to-morrow, and that action be then had. And I therefore, Mr. Speaker, ask that the report of the committee with the accompanying resolution and articles of impeachment be printed in the RECORD; that the same do lie over until to-morrow, and that the same be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow for consideration and for the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent that the report of the Judiciary Committee, together with the resolution and the articles of impeachment, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the gentleman notifies the House that to-morrow he will call up the resolution and articles of impeachment.

Mr. MANN. I would ask the gentleman whether the resolution submitted as a part of the report will be printed separately, too.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly. It will also be printed separately and be printed in the RECORD as a part of the report, because the House will have to act on the resolution and, therefore, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is right in asking that it be printed separately, just as any other resolution is printed.

The SPEAKER. The understanding, then, is that these papers named by the gentleman from Alabama be printed in the RECORD and that the resolution be printed separately also.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is the understanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Also print same as the report?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; surely.

Mr. NORRIS. The way the Chair put it he would only print the resolution separately.

The SPEAKER. The whole thing ought to be printed separately, like any other resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. In order to have it perfectly understood, I ask that this report, just as I have presented it—and the Clerk has it there in his hand—containing, according to this print, 52 pages, beginning with the heading—

Robert W. Archbald, judge of the United States Commerce Court—

And winding up, on page 52, with—

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office—

Be printed as the report of the committee as usual, and that the resolution itself be separately printed as resolutions are usually printed and that this report be printed in its entirety in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. You wish the report printed separately?

Mr. CLAYTON. As a document and also to go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent that this document, containing 52 pages, as he states, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for to-day, and that in addition to that it be printed as a separate document.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a privileged report having been made, I take it that the Speaker will refer it to the House Calendar and to be printed.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair will do.

Mr. CLAYTON. And in anticipation of that I had those words printed on the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair orders it printed and referred to the House Calendar. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The following are the documents referred to:

[House Report No. 946, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

ROBERT W. ARCHBALD, JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES COMMERCE COURT.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany House resolution 524:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration House resolution 524, make the following report:

The resolution is in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to inquire into and concerning the official conduct of Hon. Robert W. Archbald, formerly district judge of the United States Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, and now a judge of the Commerce Court, touching his conduct in regard to the matters and things mentioned in House resolution No. 511, and especially whether said judge has been guilty of an impeachable offense, and to report to the House the conclusions of the committee in respect thereto, with appropriate recommendation;

And resolved further, That the Committee on the Judiciary shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to subpœna witnesses and to administer oaths to such witnesses; and for the purpose of making this investigation said committee is authorized to sit during the sessions of this House; and the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas for any witness or witnesses.

ORIGIN OF THIS IMPEACHMENT.

This impeachment proceeding had its origin in the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on April 25, 1912, which is set out in the following message of the President to the House of Representatives on May 3, 1912:

To the House of Representatives:

I am in receipt of a copy of a resolution adopted by the House on April 25, reading as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of any charges filed against Robert W. Archbald, associate judge of the United States Commerce Court, together with the report of any special attorney or agent appointed by the Department of Justice to investigate such charges, and a copy of any and all affidavits, photographs, and evidence filed in the Department of Justice in relation to said charges, together with a statement of the action of the Department of Justice, if any, taken upon said charges and report."

In reply, I have to state that, in February last, certain charges of improper conduct by the Hon. Robert W. Archbald, formerly district judge of the United States Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, and now judge of the Commerce Court, were brought to my attention by Commissioner Meyer of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I transmitted these charges to the Attorney General, by letter dated February 13, instructing him to investigate the matter, confer fully with Commissioner Meyer, and have his agents make as full report upon the subject as might be necessary, and, should the charges be established sufficiently to justify proceeding on them, bring the matter before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives.

The Attorney General has made a careful investigation of the charges, and as a result of that investigation has advised me that, in his opinion, the papers should be transmitted to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House to be used by them as a basis for an investigation into the facts involved in the charges. I have, therefore, directed him to transmit all of the papers to the Committee on the Judiciary; but in my opinion—and I think it will prove in the opinion of the committee—it is not compatible with the public interests to lay all these papers before the House of Representatives until the Committee on the Judiciary shall have sifted them out and determined the extent to which they deem it essential to the thoroughness of their investigation not to make the same public at the present time. But all of the papers are in the hands of the committee and, therefore, within the control of the House.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 3, 1912.

INQUIRY INTO THE ALLEGED MISCONDUCT OF JUDGE ARCHBALD.

Your committee began the hearings under House resolution 524 hereinbefore set out on May 7, 1912, and concluded such hearings on June 4, 1912. The testimony was taken by the committee in open session from day to day or from time to time until concluded. At the hearings witnesses were sworn and examined, and Judge Archbald was present in person and was represented by counsel in accordance with his request made of the committee. His counsel was permitted to cross-examine the witnesses.

The testimony taken by the committee is now presented to the House, but on account of its volume it is deemed not advisable to have the same again printed in extenso as a part of this report. A copy of such testimony and of the proceedings had at the hearings in this matter is, however, accessible to each Member of the House.

JUDGE ARCHBALD'S APPOINTMENT.

Robert W. Archbald was appointed in vacation a United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania and was duly commissioned as such judge on the 29th day of March, 1901, as appears from his commission, which is in the following words and figures:

WILLIAM MCKINLEY,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the wisdom, uprightness, and learning of Robert Wodrow Archbald, of Pennsylvania, I do appoint him United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania, as provided for by act approved March 2, 1901, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining, unto him, the said Robert Wodrow Archbald, until the end of the next session of the Senate of the United States, and no longer, subject to the conditions and provisions prescribed by law.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the Department of Justice to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 29th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1901, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and twenty-fifth.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

By the President:
JOHN W. GRIGGS, Attorney General.

After the vacation and upon the convening of Congress Robert W. Archbald was appointed a United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania and was duly commissioned as such judge on the 17th day of December, 1901, as appears from his commission, which is in the following words and figures:

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the wisdom, uprightness, and learning of Robert W. Archbald, of Pennsylvania, I have nominated, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining, unto him, the said Robert W. Archbald, during his good behavior.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the Department of Justice to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 17th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1901, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and twenty-fifth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
P. C. KNOX, Attorney General.

The said Robert W. Archbald was duly appointed an additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and was confirmed by the Senate and was duly commissioned as such judge on the 31st day of January, 1911, as will appear from his commission, which is in the following words and figures, to wit:

WILLIAM H. TAFT,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the wisdom, uprightness, and learning of Robert Wodrow Archbald, of Pennsylvania, I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to the Constitution and laws of the said United States, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining, unto him, the said Robert Wodrow Archbald, during his good behavior. Appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stats., 540), and hereby designated to serve for four years in the Commerce Court.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the Department of Justice to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 31st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1911, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-fifth.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM H. TAFT.

By the President:
GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

THE FACTS.

The facts found by your committee are substantially as follows:

THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE HILLSIDE COAL & IRON CO. RELATIVE TO THE KATYDID CULM DUMP AT MOOSIC, PA.

[See article 1.]

On or about March 31, 1911, Judge Archbald entered into a partnership agreement with one Edward J. Williams, of Scranton, Pa., for the purchase of a certain culm dump known as the Katydid culm dump, located near Moosic, Lackawanna County, Pa., for the purpose of disposing of the said property at a pecuniary profit to themselves.

Most of the coal contained in this culm dump was taken from land known as the Caldwell lot, which is owned in fee simple by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. The larger portion of the dump now rests on land known as lot 46, which is jointly owned by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and the Everhart estate. The entire capital stock of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. is owned by the Erie Railroad Co. and a number of the managing officers and directors of the railroad company are also managing officers and directors of the coal company. The Katydid dump was formed from the operation of the Katydid colliery by the firm of Robertson & Law, and later by John M. Robertson, who succeeded the firm, which operated the colliery under a verbal agreement to pay the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. certain royalties on all coal mined. It appears that the Everhart estate received certain royalties from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. for all coal above the size of pea taken from the tract in which the Everhart estate held a one-half undivided interest. The plant was operated from 1887 to 1909, when the breaker and washery were destroyed by fire, and since then the operation has been abandoned by Robertson.

In furtherance of his agreement with Williams, Judge Archbald used his official position as judge of the Commerce Court, on March 31, 1911, and at various other times, by correspondence, personal conferences, and otherwise, to improperly induce and influence the officers of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and the Erie Railroad Co. to enter into an agreement with himself and Williams to sell the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in the Katydid culm dump for a consideration of $4,500, against the policy and practice of the Erie Railroad Co. and its subsidiary, the Hillside Coal & Iron Co.

Judge Archbald and Williams then secured an option to purchase whatever equity Robertson held in this property for a consideration of $3,500 and entered into negotiations with several parties with a view to the sale of the culm dump at a large profit. One of these parties was the manager of an electric railroad who was then purchasing large quantities of coal consumed in the operation of the road from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. at the usual market rates. It was claimed that there were certain complications in the title to this property; but however this may be, Judge Archbald considered that the options from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and Robertson covered the entire interest in the dump, and so stated in a letter to this prospective purchaser.

After a careful survey a disinterested mining engineer estimates that the Katydid culm dump contains about 90,000 gross tons, of which approximately 46,704 tons are marketable coal. This coal is appraised by the engineer at $47,533.18, subject to an increase of $3,803.40 provided that an increment of small coal can be saved in the process of reclamation. It is further estimated that the operation of this culm dump by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. would net it approximately $35,000 and that the Erie Railroad Co. would realize a profit in the neighborhood of $35,000 for the transportation of the coal to tidewater, making a total profit to the Erie and its subsidiary of about $70,000.

During the period covering these negotiations with the officers of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and the Erie Railroad Co. Judge Archbald was a United States circuit judge, duly assigned to serve in the Commerce Court, and the Erie Railroad Co., a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, was a party litigant in certain suits then pending in the Commerce Court and known as The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, and The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 39. In the opinion of your committee Judge Archbald's participation in this transaction, under all the circumstances, was reprehensible and prejudicial to the confidence of the American people in the Federal judiciary.

THE ATTEMPT TO SELL THE STOCK OF THE MARIAN COAL CO. TO THE DELAWARE, LACKAWANNA & WESTERN RAILROAD CO.

[See article 2.]

On October 18, 1910, the Marian Coal Co., which operated a washery at Taylor, Pa., filed a complaint against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and several other railroads before the Interstate Commerce Commission, containing a demand for reparation for damages alleged to have been suffered by the complainant in the amount of $55,238.27, with interest, for overcharges and discrimination in freight rates, and concluding with a prayer that the Interstate Commerce Commission issue an order requiring the defendants to cease various acts alleged to have been committed for the purpose of suppressing the competition of the complainant in the coal market, and establishing just and reasonable rates upon commodities shipped by the complainant from its washery at Taylor, Pa., to all points within the jurisdiction of the commission.

Some time in July or August, 1911, William P. Boland and Christopher G. Boland, who were the controlling stockholders of the Marian Coal Co., employed one George M. Watson, of Scranton, Pa., as an attorney to effect a sale of two-thirds of the stock of the Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., and to settle this case which was still pending before the Commerce Commission. The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in this case was subject to review by the Commerce Court, and there was at that time pending in the Commerce Court a suit entitled "The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38," to which the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party litigant.

With full knowledge of these facts, Judge Archbald entered into an agreement to assist George M. Watson, for a valuable consideration, to sell the stock of the Marian Coal Co., held by the Bolands, to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and settle the case between the said coal company and the railroad company. In pursuance of this agreement, Judge Archbald, by means of correspondence, personal conferences, and otherwise, persistently attempted to induce the officers of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. to enter into an agreement with Watson to settle the case then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission and purchase the stock of the Marian Coal Co. at a highly exorbitant price.

In all of his correspondence with the officers of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. relative to this matter Judge Archbald used the official stationery of the United States Commerce Court, and it is apparent from an examination of the testimony taken before this committee that he used his influence as a judge of that court to bring about the successful consummation of these negotiations. His persistent activity in said negotiations forces the conclusion that he expected to receive a portion of the fee which the Bolands had agreed to pay Watson in the event that a settlement should be effected, together with a portion of the large amount demanded by Watson of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. in excess of the price which the Bolands were willing to accept for their stock in the Marian Coal Co.

THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE LEHIGH VALLEY COAL CO. AND THE GIRARD ESTATE RELATIVE TO A CULM DUMP KNOWN AS PACKER NO. 3, NEAR SHENANDOAH, PA.

[See article 3.]

The Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which is owned by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., holds a lease on certain coal land located near Shenandoah, Pa., and owned by the Girard estate. This lease was made to run for a period of 15 years, of which about 13 years have elapsed.

On August 11, 1911, and at numerous other times thereafter, Judge Archbald, by means of correspondence and personal interviews, persistently sought to induce, and did induce, the officers of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. to relinquish the right of that company to operate a certain culm dump, known as Packer No. 3, containing approximately 472,670 gross tons, and located on the land leased from the Girard estate, provided that a very small royalty should be paid the coal company for coal reclaimed from the dump, and provided further that the coal should be shipped over the lines of the Lehigh Valley Railroad. Judge Archbald thereafter applied to the Girard estate for an operating lease on the culm dump, known as Packer No. 3, stating that he had secured the consent of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. to operate the property if the Girard estate would approve of the arrangement. The judge proposed to pay the Girard estate the same royalties on various sizes of coal which were being paid by the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. under its lease, which was executed about 13 years theretofore, when coal values were materially less than they were at the time Judge Archbald's proposition was submitted. The trustees of the Girard estate promptly declined to grant Judge Archbald the lease on the terms proposed, and the deal has never been consummated.

While these negotiations with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. were in progress the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. was a party litigant in two suits pending before the United States Commerce Court, known as The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, and The Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, Henry E. Meeker, intervener, No. 49.

If Judge Archbald and his associates could have operated this culm dump at a profit, the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., by reason of its greater facilities for washing and shipping coal, could have operated the property at a larger profit, and it is the conclusion of your committee that the officers of the coal company relinquished the right to operate the said culm dump because of the influence exercised upon them through Judge Archbald's position as a member of the Commerce Court.

THE LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD CASE.

[See article 4.]

In February, 1911, upon the organization of the Commerce Court, a suit known as The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, which had theretofore been filed in the United States Circuit Court at Louisville, Ky., was transferred to the United States Commerce Court (Docket No. 4). The case was argued on the 2d and 3d of April, 1911, and submitted to the court for adjudication. On August 22, 1911, Judge Archbald, who afterwards delivered the majority opinion in this case, wrote to Helm Bruce, the attorney for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., at Louisville, Ky., requesting him to confer with one Compton, traffic manager of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, who had given material testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to advise the judge whether the witness intended to give an affirmative answer, as appeared from the record, or whether he intended to give a negative answer to a question propounded to him by the chairman of the commission. In pursuance of this request Bruce conferred with Compton and advised the judge that the witness intended to give a negative answer to the question referred to, which the attorney for the railroad contended was shown by the context of the testimony. The receipt of this letter was acknowledged by Judge Archbald on August 26, 1911.

On January 10, 1912, Judge Archbald again wrote to Bruce, calling attention to certain conclusions reached by another member of the court, which, it was claimed, refuted statements and contentions advanced in Bruce's original brief and sustained the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to certain features of the case. In this letter Judge Archbald asked Bruce whether he would still affirm the position taken in his brief and, if so, upon what theory it could be sustained, assuming that the conclusions of the other member of the court were correct. The judge followed this question with a number of other questions relative to the features of the case which were not then clear to the court. On January 24, 1912, Bruce sent the judge a letter in answer to the questions which had been propounded to him, wherein he argued these special features of the case in behalf of the railroad company at considerable length. His letter was clearly in the nature of a supplemental brief submitted for the purpose of overcoming certain doubts as to the merits of the case of the railroad company which apparently had arisen in the minds of some of the members of the court.

On February 28, 1912, this case was decided by the Commerce Court in favor of the railroad company. Judge Archbald wrote the opinion of the majority, which followed the views expressed by Bruce, and Judge Mack dissented. The attorneys for the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States were given no opportunity to examine and answer the arguments advanced by the attorney for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. in his communication to Judge Archbald of January 24, 1912, nor were they informed that such correspondence had been had.

In the opinion of your committee, this conduct on the part of Judge Archbald was a misbehavior in office and unfair and unjust to the parties defendant in this case.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE PHILADELPHIA & READING COAL & IRON CO. RELATIVE TO THE LINCOLN CULM DUMP NEAR LORBERRY, PA., AND THE WRONGFUL ACCEPTANCE OF A GIFT, REWARD, OR PRESENT FROM FREDERIC WARNKE, OF SCRANTON, PA.

[See article 5.]

In 1904 Frederic Warnke, of Scranton, Pa., purchased a two-thirds interest in an operating lease on some coal land located near Lorberry Junction, Pa., and owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. The entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. is owned by the Reading Co., which owns the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Co., a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce. He put up a number of improvements and operated the culm dump on the property for several years, but owing to the action of the elements his operations were carried on at a loss. Warnke then applied to the Reading Co. for the mining maps of the land covered by his lease. He was informed that the lease under which he claimed had been forfeited two years before its assignment to him, and his application was therefore denied. He then made a proposition to George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Co. and president of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to relinquish any claim that he might have in this property under his lease, provided that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. would grant him an operating lease on another property owned by said corporation at Lorberry, Pa., and known as the Lincoln culm bank.

Mr. Baer referred Warnke's proposition to Mr. W. J. Richards, vice president and general manager of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., for consideration and action. Richards and Baer thereafter concluded that there was no valid reason why they should make an exception to the general rule of the coal company not to lease its culm banks. Warnke then made several attempts, through attorneys and friends, to have this decision reconsidered, and failing in this he asked Judge Archbald to intercede in his behalf with Richards.

In the latter part of November, 1911, Judge Archbald called upon Mr. Richards at his office in Pottsville, Pa., in pursuance of an appointment made by letter, and attempted to influence Richards to reconsider his refusal to accede to Warnke's proposition. Judge Archbald was informed, however, that the decision of Richards and Baer must be considered final and the judge so advised Warnke.

In December, 1911, Warnke was considering the advisability of purchasing a certain culm fill located near Pittston, Pa., and owned by the Lacoe & Shiffer Coal Co. One John Henry Jones, of Scranton, Pa., advised him that Judge Archbald was familiar with the title to the property and the rights of way of certain railroads over it. In pursuance of this assurance from Jones, Warnke consulted the judge, who advised him that the title was clear. Warnke had but two conversations with Judge Archbald regarding this matter, not exceeding 30 minutes in length altogether, but he at that time stated to Judge Archbald that he would pay the judge $500 for the information which he had received. Shortly thereafter Warnke and several business associates purchased this property for a consideration of $7,500, and in the month of March, 1911, a day or so after Judge

Archbald had called at the office of Warnke and his associates, Warnke drew a promissory note for $500, as president of the coal company which had purchased the fill, and caused the same to be delivered to Judge Archbald. The note was discounted in one of the banks of Scranton, but has not yet matured.

Your committee finds that Judge Archbald was guilty of misbehavior in office in attempting to use his influence as a member of the Commerce Court with the officials of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. and its allied railroad corporation for the purpose of aiding Warnke to secure a lease on a certain culm bank owned by the coal and iron company, after the managing officers of said company had declined to grant the lease. Thereafter Warnke gave Judge Archbald $500 in the guise of compensation for legal advice rendered, but which, in fact, was in the nature of a reward for favors previously shown in connection with the judge's efforts to bring about the acceptance of Warnke's proposition to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co.

THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE LEHIGH VALLEY COAL CO. RELATIVE TO THE EVERHART TRACT AND THE MORRIS AND ESSEX TRACT.

[See article 6.]

Since 1884 the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which is a subsidiary of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., has owned a one-half interest in a certain tract of coal land located near Wilkes-Barre, Pa., which consists of about 800 acres. During the past few years this company has purchased about four-fifths of the remaining one-half interest in this tract. The remaining portion of the tract is leased by the coal company from certain beneficiaries of the Everhart estate. The coal company has been negotiating for several years to purchase the fee to this outstanding portion of the tract, but the owners would not accept the terms offered.

In December, 1911, or January, 1912, Judge Archbald entered into an agreement with one James R. Dainty, of Scranton, Pa., to open negotiations with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Everhart estate for the purpose of effecting the sale of this property to the coal company, on the understanding that he and Dainty should secure an operating lease on another tract of about 325 acres of coal land owned by the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., and known as the Morris and Essex tract, as a consideration in the nature of a commission for their services.

In furtherance of this agreement Judge Archbald attempted to use his official influence as a member of the Commerce Court, through telephone conversations and personal conferences, to affect the action of the general manager of the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. with respect to the purchase of this property. While these negotiations were in progress the cases of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission and Henry E. Meeker, intervenor, No. 49, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, in which the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. was a party litigant, were pending before the Commerce Court for adjudication. The persistency with which Judge Archbald sought these business favors or property concessions from railroad companies having litigation, or likely to have litigation, before the Commerce Court indicates a well-defined plan to use his official position and influence as a member of such court for financial gain and profit.

THE DISCOUNT OF THE W. W. RISSINGER NOTE.

[See article 7.]

In the fall of 1908 the case of The Old Plymouth Coal Co. v. The Equitable Fire & Marine Insurance Co. et al. was pending before the United States district court over which Judge Archbald presided. Mr. W. W. Rissinger, of Scranton, Pa., was the controlling stockholder of the plaintiff company. The case was predicated on certain insurance contracts between the Old Plymouth Coal Co. and the various insurance companies named as parties defendant, and the total damages sought to be recovered amounted to about $30,000. The case was on trial in November, 1908, and after the plaintiff's evidence had been presented the defendant insurance companies demurred to the sufficiency of the evidence and moved for a nonsuit. After extended argument by attorneys for both plaintiff and defendant Judge Archbald overruled the motion and the defendant companies proceeded to introduce their evidence. Before the evidence was all in the attorneys for the insurance companies made a proposition of compromise to the attorneys for the Old Plymouth Coal Co., which was accepted on November 23, 1908. Consent judgments were entered on that day, in which the plaintiff ultimately recovered about $28,000, and the defendant companies were given 15 days in which to satisfy the judgments.

Some time prior to November 28, 1908, Judge Archbald entered into a deal with Rissinger for the purchase of an interest in a gold-mining project in Honduras, which Rissinger was then promoting in Scranton. In order to finance the transaction, it became necessary to raise $2,500, and on November 28, 1908, or five days after the judgments in favor of the Old Plymouth Coal Co. were entered, a promissory note for that amount, to run three months, signed by Rissinger, in favor of and indorsed by Judge Archbald, and Sophia J. Hutchison, Mr. Rissinger's mother-in-law, was presented to the County Savings Bank of Scranton, Pa., for discount. The bank evidently put no reliance upon Judge Archbald's indorsement of the note, but made an extended investigation of Mrs. Hutchison's financial condition, and on December 12, 1908, discounted the note, after first filing a judgment against Mrs. Hutchison in the county court of Lackawanna County, Pa., according to the practice in that State.

Shortly after the consent judgments in favor of the Old Plymouth Coal Co. were entered on November 23, 1908, this note was also presented for discount to Mr. John T. Lenahan, one of the attorneys for Rissinger and the Old Plymouth Coal Co. in the litigation with the insurance companies, but Lenahan refused to discount the note or have the same discounted in a trust company of which he was a director. The note has never been paid, but has been renewed at the expiration of each successive period of three months by Mr. Rissinger, and the discount on the renewals have been paid by him.

The attempt to discount this note, coming but a few days after the Old Plymouth Coal Co. had prevailed in the litigation with the insurance companies, tends strongly to indicate that Judge Archbald had entered into negotiations with Rissinger while such litigation was pending before the United States district court of which he was judge.

But, at all events, the action of Judge Archbald in accepting an interest in this enterprise, under the conditions, constituted misbehavior in office.

THE DISCOUNT OF THE JOHN HENRY JONES NOTE.

[See articles 8 and 9.]

In the fall of the year 1909 the case of John W. Peale v. The Marian Coal Co., which involved a considerable sum of money, was pending before the United States district court at Scranton, Pa., over which Judge Archbald presided. The Marian Coal Co. was principally owned and controlled by Christopher G. Boland and William P. Boland, of Scranton, Pa., and this fact was well known to Judge Archbald. In the latter part of November or the early part of December, 1909, for the purpose of raising funds to invest in a timber project in Venezuela, which was being promoted by one John Henry Jones, of Scranton, Pa., Judge Archbald drew and indorsed a promissory note for $500, payable to himself, which note was signed by Jones as promisor.

Judge Archbald thereupon agreed and consented that Edward J. Williams should present this note to Christopher G. Boland and William P. Boland, or either of them, for discount. In pursuance of this agreement or approval of Judge Archbald, Williams did present the note to each of the Bolands for the purpose of having the same discounted, but they refused to grant the discount, on the ground that it would be highly improper for them to do so under the existing circumstances. Williams reported the refusal of the Bolands to discount the note to Judge Archbald, and thereafter took it to the Merchants & Mechanics Bank of Scranton, but this bank also refused to discount the paper.

The note was finally discounted by John Henry Jones in the Providence Bank, a small State bank located in a suburb of Scranton. The president of this bank was one C. H. Von Storch, of Scranton, Pa., an attorney at law, who had prevailed as a party in interest in litigation before Judge Archbald's court within a year prior to the date of the discount of the note. The note was brought to Von Storch by Jones at the suggestion of Judge Archbald. Moreover, Judge Archbald advised Von Storch that he would consider it a great favor if the discount should be granted. The note has never been paid, although the bank has made at least one call for payment, and the discount on each renewal has been paid by John Henry Jones.

It is apparent that Judge Archbald's financial condition at the time the incident occurred was such that his note was not considered good bankable paper, and your committee is forced to the conclusion that he attempted to use his influence as judge to secure the loan from parties litigant before his court, and, failing in this, he did use his influence as such judge to secure the loan through an attorney who was then practicing before his court and who had but a short while before received favorable judgment in a suit adjudicated therein.

THE WRONGFUL ACCEPTANCE OF MONEY ON THE OCCASION OF A PLEASURE TRIP TO EUROPE.

[See articles 10 and 11.]

In the spring of 1910 Judge Archbald allowed one Henry W. Cannon, of New York City, to pay his entire expenses on a pleasure trip to Europe. Mr. Cannon was then, and still is, a stockholder and officer in various interstate railroad corporations, including the Great Northern Railroad, the Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co., the Fort Wayne, Cincinnati & Louisville Railroad Co.; the Pacific Coast Co., which owns the entire stock of the Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad Co.; the Pacific Coast Railroad Co.; and the Pacific Coast Steamship Co., together with various other corporations engaged in the business of mining and shipping coal.

It is claimed that Mr. Cannon is a distant relative of Judge Archbald's wife, but, however this may be, your committee regards it as improper for a judge to thus obligate himself to an officer of numerous corporations likely to become directly or indirectly involved in litigation before his court or before other courts over which he might be called upon to preside from time to time.

On the occasion of this same pleasure trip to Europe one Edward R. W. Searle, clerk of the United States district court at Scranton, Pa., and one J. B. Woodward, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., jury commissioner of said court, both of whom were appointed by Judge Archbald, raised a subscription fund of money amounting to more than $500, which was presented to Judge Archbald on his departure. This fund was not raised as the result of a bar-association movement, but was composed of contributions of varying amounts from certain attorneys practicing before the United States district court, some of whom had cases then pending before said court for adjudication.

Judge Archbald accepted this fund of money and acknowledged receipt of the same to the contributors whose names were submitted to him at the time that the fund was presented. Your committee regards it as improper and subversive of the confidence of the public in the judiciary for a judge to place himself in this manner under obligations to attorneys practicing before his court.

THE APPOINTMENT OF A RAILROAD ATTORNEY AS JURY COMMISSIONER.

[See article 12.]

On March 29, 1901, Judge Archbald was appointed United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania. On April 9, 1901, under the exercise of authority granted by the act of June 30, 1879 (21 Stat., 43), Judge Archbald appointed one J. B. Woodward, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., as jury commissioner of the said district court. The said Woodward was then and has since been a general attorney for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.

Under the annual appropriation acts, the compensation of jury commissioners is limited to $5 per day, for not more than three days at any one term of court. It is apparent that the compensation attached to this position is so insignificant that the appointment would have no attraction for a railroad attorney except for the power it affords in the selection of juries for the trial of cases in the Federal courts.

Judge Archbald's action in appointing to this position the legal representative of a large railroad corporation which was likely to become directly or indirectly involved in litigation before the United States district court was misbehavior in office, calculated to bring the Federal judiciary into disrepute.

GENERAL MISBEHAVIOR OF JUDGE ARCHBALD.

[See article 13.]

The testimony in the whole case tends to support this general specification. Judge Archbald was appointed a United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania on the 29th day of March, 1901, and held such office until January 31, 1911, on which last-named date he was appointed an additional United States circuit judge, and on the same day was duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, which position he has since held and now holds.

The testimony shows that at different times while Judge Archbald was a judge of the United States district court he sought and obtained credit and in other instances sought to obtain credit from persons who had litigation pending in his said court or who had had litigation pending in his said court.

The testimony shows that after Judge Archbald had been promoted to the position of a United States circuit judge and had been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, he in connection with different persons sought to obtain options on culm dumps and other coal properties from officers and agents of coal companies which were owned and controlled by railroad companies.

The testimony further shows that in order to influence the officers of the coal companies which were subsidiary to and owned by the railroad companies, Judge Archbald repeatedly sought to influence the officials of the railroads to enter into contracts with his associates for the financial benefit of himself and his said associates. In most instances the contracts were executed in the name of the person associated with the judge in the particular transaction or trade, and the judge's name was not disclosed on the face of the contract. The testimony shows, however, that he was, as a matter of fact, pecuniarily interested in such contracts, and that while his interest was not known to the public it was known to the officials of the railroad companies and of the coal companies, subsidiary corporations thereof. The evidence discloses that while the judge's several associates or partners would locate properties, the judge would take up the matter of the purchase or sale of said properties with the officials of the coal companies and of the railroad companies which, as already stated, in most instances owned and controlled the coal companies. The testimony shows that while these negotiations were being conducted, and agreements were made and sought to be made, the railroad companies with whose officers Judge Archbald was making contracts and agreements and seeking to make contracts and agreements were common carriers engaged in interstate commerce and had litigation pending in the United States Commerce Court.

The testimony shows that such options, contracts, and agreements were sought and obtained and sought to be obtained by Judge Archbald to such an extent that the exposure of the judge's several transactions through the press gave rise to a public scandal.

The testimony fails to disclose any case in which Judge Archbald invested any actual money of his own in any of these several trades or deals, but shows that he used his personal influence as a judge, in consideration of which he received or was to receive his share or interest in the property or his profits in the deal.

Your committee finds that Judge Archbald by his conduct in carrying on traffic in culm dumps and coal properties owned directly or indirectly by railroads, and in using his influence to secure such contracts from coal companies which were owned and controlled by railroad companies as aforesaid, and in using his influence with high officials of said railroads to induce them to permit or direct the said coal companies to enter into contracts with him or his associates which resulted in financial profit to himself and those associated with him, grossly abused the proprieties of his said office of judge, was guilty of misbehavior and of a misdemeanor in office.

THE LAW.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO JUDICIAL IMPEACHMENTS.

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States bearing upon the impeachment of judges are as follows:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Art. I, sec. 2.)

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. (Art. I, sec. 3.)

The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Art. II, sec. 2.)

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and disdemeanors. (Art. II, sec. 4.)

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. (Art. III, sec. 1.)

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. (Art. III, sec. 2.)

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for the purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present. (Art. I, sec. 3.)

THE GENERAL NATURE OF IMPEACHMENTS.

The fundamental law of impeachment was stated by Richard Wooddesson, an eminent authority, in his Law Lectures delivered at Oxford in 1777, as follows (vol. 2, pp. 355, 358):

It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community and at the same time in a manner not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents and the nature of such offenses may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court and the wisdom of the sagest assembly. The Commons, therefore, as the grand inquest of the nation, became suitors for penal justice, and they can not consistently, either with their own dignity or with safety to the accused, sue elsewhere but to those who share with them in the legislature.

On this policy is founded the origin of impeachments, which began soon after the constitution assumed its present form (p. 355).

* * * * * * *

Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the Commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust, are most proper—and have been the most usual grounds—for this kind of prosecution (p. 358).

Referring to the function of impeachments, Rawle, in his work on the Constitution (p. 211), says:

The delegation of important trusts affecting the higher interests of society is always from various causes liable to abuse. The fondness frequently felt for the inordinate extension of power, the influence of party and of prejudice, the seductions of foreign states or the baser appetite for illegitimate emoluments, are sometimes productions of what are not unaptly termed "political offenses" (Federalist, No. 65), which it would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding.

The involutions and varieties of vice are too many and too artful to be anticipated by positive law.

In Story on the Constitution (vol. 1, 5th ed., p. 584) the parliamentary history of impeachments is briefly stated as follows:

800. In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments, it will be found that many offenses, not easily definable by law, and many of a purely political character, have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy. Thus lord chancellors and judges and other magistrates have not only been impeached for bribery, and acting grossly contrary to the duties of their office, but for misleading their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions, and for attempts to subvert the fundamental laws, and introduce arbitrary power. So where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the great seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admiral to have neglected the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to have betrayed his trust, a privy councilor to have propounded or supported pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to have obtained exorbitant grants or incompatible employments—these have been all deemed impeachable offenses. Some of the offenses, indeed, for which persons were impeached in the early ages of British jurisprudence, would now seem harsh and severe; but perhaps they were rendered necessary by existing corruptions, and the importance of suppressing a spirit of favoritism and court intrigue. Thus persons have been impeached for giving bad counsel to the King, advising a prejudicial peace, enticing the King to act against the advice of Parliament, purchasing offices, giving medicine to the King without advice of physicians, preventing other persons from giving counsel to the King except in their presence, and procuring exorbitant personal grants from the King. But others, again, were founded in the most salutary public justice, such as impeachments for malversations and neglects in office, for encouraging pirates, for official oppression, extortions, and deceits, and especially for putting good magistrates out of office and advancing bad. One can not but be struck, in this slight enumeration, with the utter unfitness of the common tribunals of justice to take cognizance of such offenses, and with the entire propriety of confiding the jurisdiction over them to a tribunal capable of understanding and reforming and scrutinizing the polity of the state, and of sufficient dignity to maintain the independence and reputation of worthy public officers.

IMPEACHABLE OFFENSES UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

The provision in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States defining impeachable offenses as "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" was taken from the British parliamentary law, established and prevailing at the time of the formation of our Government. It must, therefore, be interpreted by the light of time-honored parliamentary usage, as contradistinguished from the common municipal law of England.

Our fathers, mindful of the flagrant persecution of the subjects of England in the guise of prosecutions for treason against the Crown, specifically defined the elements of the offense of treason against the United States in Article III, section 3, of our organic law.

The offense of bribery had a fixed status in the parliamentary law as well as the criminal law of England when our Constitution was adopted, and there is little difficulty in determining its nature and extent in the application of the law of impeachments in this country.

In addition to the specific offenses of treason and bribery, all offenses falling within the classification of "high crimes and misdemeanors," which were subjects of impeachment by the British Parliament, were made impeachable offenses under the Constitution of the United States, subject to the limitations prescribed by that instrument.

In a footnote to Fourth Blackstone (p. 5, Lewis's Ed.) Christian says:

The word "crime" has no technical meaning in the law of England. It seems, when it has a reference to positive law, to comprehend those acts which subject the offender to punishment. When the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" are used in prosecutions by impeachment, the words "high crimes" have no definite signification but are used merely to give greater solemnity to the charge.

The term "misdemeanor" has a twofold legal significance. Under the common law it signifies a criminal offense, not amounting to felony, which is punishable by indictment or other special criminal proceeding. As applied to civil officers, in the sense of the lex parliamentaria, it signifies maladministration or misbehavior in office, irrespective of whether such conduct is or is not indictable.

It is well established by the authorities that impeachable offenses under the British constitution and under our Constitution are not limited to statutable crimes and misdemeanors or to offenses indictable under the common law and triable in the courts of ordinary jurisdiction.

In his commentaries on the Constitution John Randolph Tucker defines impeachable offenses as follows (vol. 1, sec. 200):

What are impeachable offenses?

(a) Treason: This is defined by the Constitution.

(b) Bribery: Which needs no special comment. For its definition resort may be had to its meaning in Criminal Procedure.

(c) High crimes and misdemeanors. What is the meaning of these terms? Much controversy has arisen out of this question. Do these words refer only to offenses for which the party may be indicted under the authority of the United States? Do they mean offenses by the common law? Do they include offenses against the laws of the State, or do they mean offenses for which there is no indictment in the ordinary courts of justice? Or do they include maladministration, unconstitutional action of an officer willful or mistaken, or illegal action willful or mistaken?

(d) Up to September 8, 1787, the clause in reference to the impeachable offenses only included treason and bribery. On that day Mr. Mason moved to add the words "or maladministration." Mr. Madison objected to the vagueness of this term, whereupon Mr. Mason withdrew the word "maladministration" and substituted "other high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States," and the clause was then agreed to by a vote of 10 States to 1. As the word "other" is inserted before the words "high crimes and misdemeanors," these last words may be interpreted by the nature of the crimes "treason and bribery." Why should an officer be impeached for treason? Obviously because an officer guilty of treason against the United States would be disqualified personally from being an officer of a government to which he was a traitor. How could a President properly command an Army of the United States when he was engaged in levying war against them or adhering to their enemies? The utter inconsistency of this double position made it a proper offense for the jurisdiction of impeachment. The same objection would apply to any other officer of the United States. To be employed in the service of the United States against which he was levying war or adhering to their enemies was a total personal disqualification.

(e) So in respect to bribery. Bribery corrupts public duty. The difference between treason and bribery is that the first is a crime defined by the Constitution, as to which Congress has no power except to declare its punishment. Bribery is not a constitutional crime, and was not made a crime against the United States by statute until April, 1790. These two cases, therefore, show that the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" can not be confined to crimes created and defined by a statute of the United States; for if Congress had ever failed to have fixed a punishment for the constitutional crime of treason, or had failed to pass an act in reference to the crime of bribery, as it did fail for more than a year after the Constitution went into operation, it would result that no officer would be impeachable for either crime, because Congress had failed to pass the needful statutes defining crime in the case of bribery and prescribing the punishment in the case of treason as well as bribery. It can hardly be supposed that the Constitution intended to make impeachment for these two flagrant crimes depend upon the action of Congress. The conclusion from this would seem to be inevitable that treason and bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, in respect to which Congress had failed to legislate would still be within the jurisdiction of the process of impeachment.

(f) The word "maladministration," which Mr. Mason originally proposed, and which he displaced because of its vagueness for the words "other high crimes and misdemeanors," was intended to embrace all official delinquency or maladministration by an officer of the Government where it was criminal; that is, where the act done was done with willful purpose to violate public duty. There can be no crime in an act where it is done through inadvertence or mistake or from misjudgment. Where it is a willful and purposed violation of duty it is criminal.

(g) This construction is aided by the fact that judges hold their offices during "good behavior." These words do not mean that a judge shall decide rightly, but that he shall decide conscientiously. He is not amenable to impeachment for a wrong decision, else when an inferior judge is reversed he would be impeachable; or, in the Supreme Court, a dissenting judge might be held impeachable because a large majority of the court affirmed the law to be otherwise. But if he decides unconscientiously—if he decides contrary to his honest conviction from corrupt partiality—this can not be good behavior, and he is impeachable. Again, if the judge is drunken on the bench, this is ill behavior, for which he is impeachable. And all of these are generally criminal or misdemeanor, for misdemeanor is a synonymn for misbehavior. So, if he omits a judcial duty, as well as when he commits a violation of duty, he is guilty of crime or misdemeanor; for, says Blackstone, "crime or misdemeanor is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it."

To confine the impeachable offenses to those which are made crimes or misdemeanors by statute or other specific law would too much constrict the jurisdiction to meet the obvious purpose of the Constitution, which was, by impeachment, to deprive of office those who by any act of omission or commission showed clear and flagrant disqualification to hold it. On the other hand, to hold that all departures from, or failures in, duty, which were not willful, but due to mistake, inadvertence, or misjudgment, and to let in all offenses at common law, which, by the decisions of the Supreme Court, are not within Federal authority at all, would be to extend the jurisdiction by impeachment far beyond what was obviously the purpose and design of its creation. It must be criminal misbehavior—a purposed defiance of official duty—to disqualify the man from holding office or disable him from ever after holding office, which constitute the penalty upon conviction under the impeachment process. The punishment, upon conviction, indicates the character of the crime or misdemeanor for which impeachment is constitutional. If the crime or misdemeanor for which the impeachment is made be not such as to justify the punishment inflicted, we may well conclude it was within the purpose of the Constitution in using the impeachment procedure.

In Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law it is said (p. 178):

The offenses for which the President or any other officer may be impeached are any such as in the opinion of the House are deserving of punishment under that process. They are not necessarily offenses against the general laws. In the history of England where the like proceeding obtains, the offenses have often been political, and in some cases for gross betrayal of public interests punishment has very justly been inflicted on cabinet officers. It is often found that offenses of a very serious nature by high officers are not offenses against the criminal code, but consist in abuses or betrayals of trust or inexcusable neglects of duty, which are dangerous and criminal because of the immense interests involved and the greatness of the trust which has not been kept. Such cases must be left to be dealt with on their own facts and judged according to their apparent deserts (p. 178).

In his work on the Constitutional History of the United States, George Ticknor Curtis says (vol. 1, pp. 481–482):

Among the sperate functions assigned by the Constitution to the Houses of Congress are those of presenting and trying impeachments. An impeachment, in the report of the committee of detail, was treated as an ordinary judicial proceeding and was placed within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. That this was not in all respects a suitable provision will appear from the following considerations: Although an impeachment may involve an inquiry whether a crime against any positive law has been committed, yet it is not necessarily a trial for crime, nor is there any necessity, in the case of crimes committed by public officers, for the institution of any special proceeding for the infliction of the punishment prescribed by the laws, since they, like all other persons, are amenable to the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts of justice in respect of offenses against positive law. The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law has been committed, as where the individual has, from immorality or imbecility or maladministration, become unfit to exercise the office. The rules by which an impeachment is to be determined are therefore peculiar and are not fully embraced by those principles or provisions of law which courts of ordinary jurisdiction are required to administer. (Vol. 1, pp. 481–482.)

In Watson on the Constitution (vol 2, p. 1034, published in 1910) it is said:

A misdemeanor comprehends all indictable offenses which do not amount to a felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, attempts and solicitations to commit felonies, etc. These seem to be the definitions of these terms at common law, but it would be strange if a civil officer could be impeached for only such offenses as are embraced within the common-law definition of "other high crimes and misdemeanors." There is a parliamentary definition of the term "misdemeanor," and a modern writer on the Constitution has said: "The term 'high crimes and misdemeanors' has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment. It can only be found in the law of Parliament and is the technical term which was used by the Commons at the Bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States." Synonymous with the term "misdemeanor" are the terms misdeed, misconduct, misbehavior, fault, transgression.

In Story on the Constitution (5th ed., vol. 1, secs. 796, 799) it is said:

Is the silence of the statute book to be deemed conclusive in favor of the party until Congress have made a legislative declaration and enumeration of the offenses which shall be deemed high crimes and misdemeanors? If so, then, as has been truly remarked, the power of impeachment, except as to the two expressed cases, is a complete nullity, and the party is wholly dispunishable however enormous may be his corruption and criminality. (Sec. 796.)

Congress has unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct; and the rules of proceeding, and the rules of evidence, as well as the principles of decision, have been uniformly regulated by the known doctrines of the common law and parliamentary usage. In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried, no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanors. (Sec. 799.)

Foster, in his work on the Constitution (sec. 93), says:

The term "high crimes and misdemeanors" has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment. It can be found only in the law of Parliament and is the technical term which has been used by the Commons at the Bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States.

* * * * * * *

Impeachable offenses are those which were the subject of impeachment by the practice in Parliament before the Declaration of Independence, except in so far as that practice is repugnant to the language of the Constitution and the spirit of American institutions. An examination of the English precedents will show that, although private citizens as well as public officers have been impeached, no article has been presented or sustained which did not charge either misconduct in office or some offense which was injurious to the welfare of the State at large.

In this class of cases, which rest so much in the discretion of the Senate, the writer would be rash who were to attempt to prescribe the limits of its jurisdiction in this respect.

An impeachable offense may consist of treason, bribery, or a breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness, when habitual or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, and profanity, obscenity, or other language, used in the discharge of an official function, which tends to bring the office into disrepute, or an abuse or reckless exercise of a discretionary power, as well as a breach or omission of an official duty imposed by statute or common law; or a public speech when off duty which encourages insurrection. It does not consist in an error in judgment made in good faith in the decision of a doubtful question of law, except perhaps in the case of a violation of the Constitution.

In the American and English Enclycopedia of Law, second edition (vol. 15, pp. 1066–1068), it is said:

The Constitution of the United States provides that the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. If impeachment in England be regarded merely as a mode of trial for the punishment of common-law or statutory crimes, and if the Constitution has adopted it only as a mode of procedure, leaving the crimes to which it is to be applied to be settled by the general rules of criminal law, then, as it is well settled that in regard to the National Government there are no common-law crimes, it would seem necessarily to follow that impeachment can be instituted only for crimes specifically named in the Constitution or for offenses declared to be crimes by Federal statute. This view has been maintained by very eminent authority, but the cases of impeachment that have been brought under the Constitution would seem to give to the remedy a much wider scope than the above rule would indicate. In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the Senate in which a conviction resulted the defendant was found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute, and in almost every case brought offenses were charged in the articles of impeachment which were not indictable under any Federal statute, and in several cases they were such as constituted neither a statutory nor a common-law crime. The impeachability of the offenses charged in the articles was in most of the cases not denied. In one case, however, counsel for the defendant insisted that impeachment would not lie for any but an indictable offense; but after exhaustive argument on both sides this defense was practically abandoned. The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes; that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to be taken not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense, and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruption, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties, by judges and high officers of State, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute. Additional weight is added to this interpretation of the Constitution by the opinions of eminent writers on constitutional and parliamentary law and by the fact that some of the most distinguished members of the convention that framed it have thus interpreted it.

It will thus be seen that the common law of crimes and the parliamentary law of impeachments have no direct connection, although the principles of the one may be invoked in the application of the other. They represent two distinct branches in our scheme of jurisprudence and they should be so treated in the consideration of the case which is here presented.

THE TENURE OF FEDERAL JUDGES LIMITED TO "DURING GOOD BEHAVIOR."

The provision in Article III, section 1, of our Constitution that "the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior," which was also borrowed from the English laws, should be considered in pari materia with Article IV, section 2, providing that all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office upon "impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Good behavior is thus made the essential condition on which the tenure to the judicial office rests, and any act committed or omitted by the incumbent in violation of this condition necessarily works a forfeiture of the office. The Constitution provides no method whereby a civil officer of the United States can be removed from office save by impeachment. It follows, therefore, that the framers of our Constitution must have intended that Federal judges, who are civil officers, should be removable from office by impeachment for misbehavior, which is the antithesis of good behavior. Otherwise the constitutional provision limiting the tenure of the judicial office to "during good behavior" would be without force and effect.

In his work on the Constitution, Foster says (p. 586):

The Constitution provides that—

"The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior."

This necessarily implies that they may be removed in case of bad behavior. But no means except impeachment is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law.

In Watson on the Constitution, the proposition is stated as follows (vol. 2, pp. 1036–1037):

A civil officer may so behave in public as to bring disgrace upon himself and shame upon his country, and he may continue to do this until his name would become a national stench, and yet he would not be subject to indictment by any law of the United States, but he certainly could be impeached. What will those who advocate the doctrine that impeachment will not lie except for an offense punishable by statute do with the constitutional provision relative to judges which says, "Judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior"? This means that as long as they behave themselves their tenure of office is fixed, and they can not be disturbed. But suppose they cease to behave themselves? When the Constitution says "A judge shall hold his office during good behavior" it means that he shall not hold it when it ceases to be good. Suppose he should refuse to sit upon the bench and discharge the duties which the Constitution and the law enjoin upon him, or should become a notoriously corrupt character, and live a notoriously corrupt and debauched life? He could not be indicted for such conduct, and he could not be removed except by impeachment. Would it be claimed that impeachment would not be the proper remedy in such a case?

IMPEACHMENTS NOT CONFINED TO OFFENSES COMMITTED IN AN OFFICIAL CAPACITY.

It is not essential that an offense should be committed in an official capacity in order that it may come within the purview of the constitutional provisions relating to impeachments.

Black, in his work on Constitutional Law, says (2d ed., pp. 121–122):

Treason and bribery are well-defined crimes. But the phrase "other high crimes and misdemeanors" is so very indefinite that practically it is not susceptible of exact definition or limitation, but the power of impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the Constitution or the laws which, in the judgment of the House, is deserving of punishment by this means or is of such a character as to render the party accused unfit to hold and exercise his office. It is, of course, primarily directed against official misconduct. Any gross malversation in office, whether or not it is a punishable offense at law, may be made the ground of an impeachment. But the power of impeachment is not restricted to political crimes alone. The Constitution provides that the party convicted upon impeachment shall still remain liable to trial and punishment according to law. From this it is to be inferred that the commission of any crime which is of a grave nature, though it may have nothing to do with the person's official position, except that it shows a character or motives inconsistent with the due administration of his office, would render him liable to impeachment. It will be perceived that the power to determine what crimes are impeachable rests very much with Congress. For the House, before preferring articles of impeachment, will decide whether the acts or conduct complained of constitute a "high crime or misdemeanor." And the Senate, in trying the case, will also have to consider the same question. If, in the judgment of the Senate, the offense charged is not impeachable, they will acquit; otherwise, upon sufficient proof and the concurrence of the necessary majority, they will convict. And in either case there is no other power which can review or reverse their decision.

In 1862 West H. Humphreys, United States district judge for the district of Tennessee, was impeached on several specifications, one of which was based on his action in making a speech at a public meeting, while off the bench, inciting revolt and rebellion against the Constitution and Government of the United States. The evidence clearly showed that he was in no wise acting in a judicial capacity, yet he was convicted on this charge.

A number of the impeachments of judges of the several States of the Union have been predicated on various acts of debauchery entirely separate from the performance of their official duties.

Any conduct on the part of a judge which reflects on his integrity as a man or his fitness to perform the judicial functions should be sufficient to sustain his impeachment. It would be both absurd and monstrous to hold that an impeachable offense must needs be committed in an official capacity. If such an atrocious doctrine should receive the sanction of the congressional authority, there is no limit to the variety and the viciousness of the offenses which a Federal judge might commit with perfect immunity from effective impeachment.

IMPEACHMENT FOR OFFENSES COMMITTED IN ANOTHER JUDICIAL OFFICE.

Certain of the proposed articles of impeachment against Judge Archbald are based on offenses committed while he held the office of United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania, whereas he now holds the office of circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, and is assigned to serve for a period of four years in the Commerce Court. In this respect the case here presented seems to be unique in the annals of impeachment proceedings under our Constitution.

By virtue of the provisions of section 609 of the Revised Statutes, which were then in force, Judge Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge, was duly clothed with authority to sit or preside in the United States circuit court, and he was actually presiding over such circuit court at Scranton, Pa., during the time that some or all of the offenses charged in these articles were committed.

Since his elevation to a circuit judgeship the United States circuit courts have been abolished by the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat., 1087), entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," but the provisions relative to the interchangeability of district and circuit judges remain substantially the same. Section 18 of this act provides that—

Whenever, in the judgment of the senior circuit judge of the circuit in which the district lies, or of the circuit justice assigned to such circuit, or of the Chief Justice, the public interest shall require, the said judge or associate justice or Chief Justice shall designate and appoint any circuit judge of the circuit to hold said district court.

Thus it appears that Judge Archbald now holds a civil office, within the meaning of the Constitution, of the same judicial nature as the office held by him at the time of the commission of the offenses charged in the said articles, and that, under the existing law, he may be called upon at any time to perform precisely the same functions that he performed as United States district judge.

In State v. Hill (37 Nebr., 80) the Legislature of Nebraska had impeached certain ex-officers of the State for offenses alleged to have been committed during their respective terms of office. The Supreme Court of Nebraska held that inasmuch as they had ceased to be civil officers of the State they were not subject to impeachment. In the course of the decision the court said (pp. 88–89):

Judge Barnard was impeached in the State of New York during his second term for acts committed in his previous term of office. His plea that he was not liable to impeachment for offenses occurring in the first term was overruled. Precisely the same question was raised in the impeachment proceedings against Judge Hubbel, of Wisconsin, and on the trial of Gov. Butler, of this State, and in each of which the ruling was the same as in the Barnard case. There was good reason for overruling the plea to the jurisdiction in the three cases just mentioned. Each respondent was a civil officer at the time he was impeached and had been such uninterruptedly since the alleged misdemeanors in office were committed. The fact that the offense occurred in the previous term was immaterial. The object of impeachment is to remove a corrupt or unworthy officer. If his term has expired and he is no longer in office, that object is attained and the reason for his impeachment no longer exists. But if the offender is still an officer, he is amenable to impeachment, although the acts charged were committed in his previous term of the same office.

In the cases discussed there was a constructive breach in the tenure of the offices held by the defendants between the time of the commission of the offenses charged and the adoption of the articles of impeachment. Even though the offices held by the defendants at the time of their impeachment had not been the same offices which they held at the time of the commission of the alleged offenses, it might well have been decided, on principle, that impeachment would lie if in fact the prescribed functions of such offices were of the same general nature and susceptible to the same malversations and abuse.

It is indeed anomalous if this Congress is powerless to remove a corrupt or unfit Federal judge from office because his corruption or misdemeanor, however vicious or reprehensible, may have occurred during his tenure in some other judicial office under the Government of the United States prior to his appointment to the particular office from which he is sought to be ousted by impeachment, although he may have held a Federal judgeship continuously from the time of the commission of his offenses. Surely the House of Representatives will not recognize nor the Senate apply such a narrow and technical construction of the constitutional provisions relating to impeachments.

CONCLUSION.

Judges "shall hold their offices during good behavior." Thus says the Constitution. The framers of that instrument were desirous of having an independent and incorruptible judiciary, but they never intended to provide that any judge should hold his office upon nonforfeitable life tenure. Those who formulated the organic law sought to protect the people against the malfeasance and misfeasance of unjust and corrupt judges. Therefore they wisely limited the tenure of office to "during good behavior" and provided the remedy for misbehavior to be forfeiture of office and the removal therefrom by impeachment.

The conduct of this judge has been exceedingly reprehensible and in marked contrast with the high sense of judicial ethics and probity that generally characterizes the Federal judiciary. Be it said to the credit of the wisdom of our fathers and in behalf of our American institutions that the judges have, as a rule, deported themselves in such manner as to merit and keep the confidence of the people. The public respect for the judicial branch of our Government has almost amounted to reverence. This confidence has been deserved, and let us hope that it will continue to be deserved, to the end that an upright and independent judiciary may be maintained for the perpetuation of our government of law.

A judge should be the personification of integrity, of honor, and of uprightness in his daily walk and conversation. He should hold his exalted office and the administration of justice above the sordid desire to accumulate wealth by trading or trafficking with actual or probable litigants in his court. He should be free and unaffected by any bias born of avarice and unhampered by pecuniary or other improper obligations.

Your committee is of opinion that Judge Archbald's sense of moral responsibility has become deadened. He has prostituted his high office for personal profit. He has attempted by various transactions to commercialize his potentiality as judge. He has shown an overweening desire to make gainful bargains with parties having cases before him or likely to have cases before him. To accomplish this purpose he has not hesitated to use his official power and influence. He has degraded his high office and has destroyed the confidence of the public in his judicial integrity. He has forfeited the condition upon which he holds his commission and should be removed from office by impeachment.

RECOMMENDATION.

Your committee reports herewith the accompanying resolution and articles of impeachment against Judge Robert W. Archbald, and recommends that they be adopted by the House and that they be presented to the Senate with a demand for the conviction and removal from office of said Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge designated as a member of the Commerce Court:

House resolution 622.

Resolved, That Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 36, 540), and having duly qualified and having been duly commissioned and designated on the 31st day of January, 1911, to serve for four years in the Commerce Court, be impeached for misbehavior and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the Committee on the Judiciary under House resolution 524 sustains 13 articles of impeachment which are hereinafter set out; and that said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 36, 540), and having duly qualified and having been duly commissioned and designated on the 31st day of January, 1911, to serve for four years in the Commerce Court:

ARTICLE 1.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, being a United States circuit judge, and having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and being then and there a judge of the said court, on March 31, 1911, entered into an agreement with one Edward J. Williams whereby the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams agreed to become partners in the purchase of a certain clum dump, commonly known as the Katydid culm dump, near Moosic, Pa., owned by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a corporation, and one John M. Robertson, for the purpose of disposing of said property at a profit. That pursuant to said agreement, and in furtherance thereof, the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake, by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise, to induce and influence, and did induce and influence, the officers of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and of the Erie Railroad Co., a corporation, which owned all of the stock of said coal company, to enter into an agreement with the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams to sell the interest of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in the Katydid culm dump for a consideration of $4,500. That during the period covering the several negotiations and transactions leading up to the aforesaid agreemnt the said Robert W. Archbald was a judge of the United States Commerce Court, duly designated and acting as such judge; and at the time aforesaid and during the time the aforesaid negotiations were in progress the said Erie Railroad Co. was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce and was a party litigant in certain suits, to wit, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 39, then pending in the United States Commerce Court; and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing these facts, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly took advantage of his official position as such judge to induce and influence the officials of the said Erie Railroad Co. and the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary corporation thereof, to enter into a contract with him and the said Edward J. Williams, as aforesaid, for profit to themselves, and that the said Robert W. Archbald, then and there, through the influence exerted by reason of his position as such judge, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did induce the officers of said Erie Railroad Co. and of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to enter into said contract for the consideration aforesaid.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 2.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 1st day of August, 1911, was a United States circuit judge, and, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, was then and there a judge of said court.

That at the time aforesaid the Marian Coal Co., a corporation, was the owner of a certain culm bank at Taylor, Pa., and was then and there engaged in the business of washing and shipping coal; that prior to that time the said Marian Coal Co. had filed before the Interstate Commerce Commission a complaint against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and five other railroad companies as defendants, charging said defendants with discrimination in rates and with excessive charges for the transportation of coal shipped by the said Marian Coal Co. over their respective lines of road; that all of the said defendant companies were common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. That the decision of the said case by the Interstate Commerce Commission at the instance of either party thereto was subject to review, under the law, by the United States Commerce Court; that one Christopher G. Boland and one William P. Boland were then the principal stockholders of the said Marian Coal Co. and controlled the operation of the same, and they, the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, employed one George M. Watson as an attorney to settle the case then pending as aforesaid in the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co.; and at the time aforesaid there was pending in the United States Commerce Court a certain suit entitled the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, to which suit the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party litigant.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being judge as aforesaid and well knowing these facts, did, then and there, engage, for a consideration, to assist the said George M. Watson to settle the aforesaid case then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. the said two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co., and in pursuance of said engagement the said Robert W. Archbald, on or about the 10th day of August, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake, by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise, to induce and influence the officers of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. to enter into an agreement with the said George M. Watson for the settlement of the aforesaid case and the sale of said stock of the Marian Coal Co.; and the said Robert W. Archbald thereby willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as such judge in the attempt to settle said case and to sell said stock of the said Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 3.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about October 1, 1911, did secure from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., a corporation, which coal company was then and there owned by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and which railroad company was at that time a party litigant in certain suits then pending in the United States Commerce Court, to wit, The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 38, and The Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 49, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald, an agreement which permitted said Robert W. Archbald and his associates to lease a culm dump, known as Packer No. 3, near Shenandoah, in the State of Pennsylvania, which said culm dump contained a large amount of coal, to wit, 472,670 tons, and which said culm dump the said Robert W. Archbald and his associates agreed to operate and to ship the product of the same exclusively over the lines of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; and that the said Robert W. Archbald unlawfully and corruptly did use his official position and influence as such judge to secure from the said coal company the said agreement.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a misdemeanor in such office.

ARTICLE 4.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States circuit judge and being a member of the United States Commerce Court, was and is guilty of gross and improper conduct, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor as said circuit judge and as a member of said Commerce Court in manner and form as follows, to wit: Prior to and on the 4th day of April, 1911, there was pending in said United States Commerce Court the suit of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. Said suit was argued and submitted to said United States Commerce Court on the 4th day of April, 1911; that afterwards, to wit, on the 22d day of August, 1911, while said suit was still pending in said court, and before the same had been decided, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully did write a letter to the attorney for the said Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. requesting said attorney to see one of the witnesses who had testified in said suit on behalf of said company and to get his explanation and interpretation of certain testimony that the said witness had given in said suit, and communicate the same to the said Robert W. Archbald, which request was complied with by said attorney; that afterwards, to wit, on the 10th day of January, 1912, while said suit was still pending, and before the same had been decided by said court, the said Robert W. Archbald, as judge of said court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully again did write to the said attorney that other members of said United States Commerce Court had discovered evidence on file in said suit detrimental to the said railroad company and contrary to the statements and contentions made by the said attorney, and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge of said United States Commerce Court as aforesaid, in said letter requested the said attorney to make to him, the said Robert W. Archbald, an explanation and an answer thereto; and he, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court aforesaid, did then and there request and solicit the said attorney for the said railroad company to make and deliver to the said Robert W. Archbald a further argument in support of the contentions of the said attorney so representing the said railroad company, which request was complied with by said attorney, all of which on the part of said Robert W. Archbald was done secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and which was without the knowledge or consent of the said Interstate Commerce Commission or its attorneys.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 5.

That in the year 1904 one Frederick Warnke, of Scranton, Pa., purchased a two-thirds interest in a lease on certain coal lands owned by tht Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., located near Lorberry Junction, in said State, and put up a number of improvements thereon and operated a culm dump located on said property for several years thereafter; that operations were carried on at a loss; that said Frederick Warnke thereupon applied to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. for the mining maps of the said land covered by the said lease, and was informed that the least under which he claimed had been forfeited two years before it was assigned to him, and his application for said maps was therefore denied; that said Frederick Warnke then made a proposition to George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and president of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to relinquish any claim that he might have in this property under the said lease, provided that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. would give him an operating lease on what was known as the Lincoln culm bank located near Lorberry; that said George F. Baer referred said proposition to one W. J. Richards, vice president and general manager of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., for consideration and action; that the general policy of the said coal company being adverse to the lease of any of its culm banks, the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards declined to make the lease, and the said Frederick Warnke was so advised; that the said Frederick Warnke then made several attempts, through his attorneys and friends, to have the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards reconsider their decision in the premises, but without avail; that on or about November 1, 1911, the said Frederick Warnke called upon Robert W. Archbald, who was then and now is a United States circuit judge, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and asked him, the said Robert W. Archbald, to intercede in his behalf with the said W. J. Richards; that on November 24, 1911, the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, pursuant to said request, did write a letter to the said W. J. Richards requesting an appointment with the said W. J. Richards; that several days thereafter the said Robert W. Archbald called at the office of the said W. J. Richards to intercede for the said Frederick Warnke; that the said W. J. Richards then and there informed the said Robert W. Archbald that the decision which he had given to the said Warnke must be considered as final, and the said Archbald so informed the said Warnke; that the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. is owned by the Reading Co., which also owns the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., which last-named company is a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing all the aforesaid facts, did wrongfully attempt to use his influence as such judge to aid and assist the said Frederick Warnke to secure an operating lease of the said Lincoln culm dump owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., as aforesaid, which lease the officials of the said Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had theretofore refused to grant, which said fact was also well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, shortly after the conclusion of his attempted negotiations with the officers of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. aforesaid in behalf of the said Frederick Warnke, and on or about the 31st day of March, 1912, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did accept as a gift, reward, or present from the said Frederick Warnke, tendered in consideration of favors shown him by said judge in his efforts to secure a settlement and agreement with the said railroad company and the said coal company, and for other favors shown by said judge to the said Frederick Warnke, a certain promissory note for $500 executed by the firm of Warnke & Co., of which the said Frederick Warnke was a member.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as a judge and high crimes and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 6.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about the 1st day of December, 1911, did unlawfully, improperly, and corruptly attempt to use his influence as such judge with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railway Co. to induce the officers of said companies to purchase a certain interest in a tract of coal land containing 800 acres, which interest at said time belonged to certain persons known as the Everhardt heirs.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 7.

That during the months of October and November, A. D. 1908, there was pending in the United States district court, in the city of Scranton, State of Pennsylvania, over which court Robert W. Archbald was then presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a suit or action at law wherein the Old Plymouth Coal Co. was plaintiff and the Equitable Fire & Marine Insurance Co. was defendant. That the said coal company was principally owned and entirely controlled by one W. W. Rissinger, which fact was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; that on or about November 1, 1908, and while said suit was pending, the said Robert W. Archbald and the said W. W. Rissinger wrongfully and corruptly agreed together to purchase stock in a gold-mining scheme in Honduras, Central America, for the purpose of speculation and profit; that in order to secure the money with which to purchase said stock the said Rissinger executed his promissory note in the sum of $2,500, payable to Robert W. Archbald and Sophia J. Hutchison, which said note was indorsed then and there by the said Robert W. Archbald for the purpose of having same discounted for cash; that one of the attorneys for said Rissinger in the trial of said suit was one John T. Lenahan; that on the 23d day of November, 1908, said suit came on for trial before said Robert W. Archbald, judge presiding, and a jury, and after the plaintiff's evidence was presented the defendant insurance company demurred to the sufficiency of such evidence and moved for a nonsuit, and after extended argument by attorneys for both plaintiff and defendant the said Robert W. Archbald ruled against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, and thereupon the defendant proceeded to introduce evidence, before the conclusion of which the jury was dismissed and a consent judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500, to be discharged upon the payment of $2,129.63 if paid within 15 days from November 23, 1908, and on the same day judgments were entered in a number of other like suits against different insurance companies, which resulted in the recovery of about $28,000 by the Old Plymouth Coal Co.; that before the expiration of said 15 days the said Rissinger, with the knowledge and consent of said Robert W. Archbald, presented said note to the said John T. Lenahan for discount, which was refused and which was later discounted by a bank and has never been paid.

All of which acts on the part of the said Robert W. Archbald were improper, unbecoming, and constituted misbehavior in his said office as judge and render him guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 8.

That during the summer and fall of the year 1909 there was pending in the United States district court for the middle district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton, over which court the said Robert W. Archbald was then and there presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a civil action wherein the Marian Coal Co. was defendant, which action involved a large sum of money, and which defendant coal company was principally owned and controlled by one Christopher G. Boland and one William P. Boland, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; and while said suit was so pending the said Robert W. Archbald drew a note for $500, payable to himself, and which note was signed by one John Henry Jones and indorsed by the said Robert W. Archbald, and then and there during the pendency of said suit as aforesaid the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully agreed and consented that the said note should be presented to the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, for the purpose of having the said note discounted, corruptly intending that his name on said note would coerce and induce the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, to discount the same because of the said Robert W. Archbald's position as judge, and because the said Bolands were at that time litigants in his said court.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his office as judge, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

ARTICLE 9.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, of the city of Scranton and State of Pennsylvania, on or about November 1, 1909, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton and State aforesaid, did draw a note in his own proper handwriting, payable to himself, in the sum of $500, which said note was signed by one John Henry Jones, which said note the said Robert W. Archbald indorsed for the purpose of securing the sum of $500, and the said Robert W. Archbald, well knowing that his indorsement would not secure money in the usual commercial channels, then and there wrongfully did permit the said John Henry Jones to present said note for discount, at his law office, to one C. H. Von Storch, attorney at law and practitioner in said district court, which said Von Storch, a short time prior thereto, was a party defendant in a suit in the said district court presided over by said Robert W. Archbald, which said suit was decided in favor of the said Von Storch upon a ruling by the said Robert W. Archbald; and when the said note was presented to the said Von Storch for discount, as aforesaid, the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully and improperly used his influence as such judge to induce the said Von Storch to discount same; that the said note was then and there discounted by the said Von Storch, and the same has never been paid, but is still due and owing.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his said office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

ARTICLE 10.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge, in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully did accept and receive a large sum of money, the exact amount of which is unknown to the House of Representatives, from one Henry W. Cannon; that said money so given by the said Henry W. Cannon and so unlawfully and wrongfully received and accepted by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, was for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a pleasure trip of the said Robert W. Archbald to Europe; that the said Henry W. Cannon, at the time of the giving of said money and the receipt thereof by the said Robert W. Archbald, was a stockholder and officer in various and divers interstate railway corporations, to wit: A director in the Great Northern Railway, a director in the Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co., and a director in the Fort Wayne, Cincinnati & Louisville Railroad Co.; that the said Henry W. Cannon was president and chairman of the board of directors of the Pacific Coast Co., a corporation which owned the entire capital stock of the Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad Co., the Pacific Coast Railway Co., the Pacific Coast Steamship Co., and various other corporations engaged in the mining of coal and in the development of agricultural and timber land in various parts of the United States; that the acceptance by the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding said office of United States district judge, of said favors from an officer and official of the said corporations, any of which in the due course of business was liable to be interested in litigation pending in the said court over which he presided as such judge, was improper and had a tendency to and did bring his said office of district judge into disrepute.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 11.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, did, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully accept and receive a sum of money in excess of $500, which sum of money was contributed and given to the said Robert W. Archbald by various attorneys who were practitioners in the said court presided over by the said Robert W. Archbald; that said money was raised by subscription and solicitation from said attorneys by two of the officers of said court, to wit, Edward R. W. Searle, clerk of said court, and J. B. Woodward, jury commissioner of said court, both the said Edward R. W. Searle and the said J. B. Woodward having been appointed to the said positions by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge aforesaid.

Wherefore said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 12.

That on the 9th day of April, 1901, and for a long time prior thereto, one J. B. Woodward was a general attorney for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a corporation and common carrier doing a general railroad business; that on said day the said Robert W. Archbald, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and while acting as such judge, did appoint the said J. B. Woodward as a jury commissioner in and for said judicial district, and the said J. B. Woodward, by virtue of said appointment and with the continued consent and approval of the said Robert W. Archbald, held such office and performed all the duties pertaining thereto during all the time that the said Robert W. Archbald held said office of United States district judge, and that during all of said time the said J. B. Woodward continued to act as a general attorney for the said Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; all of which was at all times well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 13.

That Robert W. Archbald, on the 29th day of March, 1901, was duly appointed United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania and held such office until the 31st day of January, 1911, on which last-named date he was duly appointed a United States circuit judge and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

That during the time in which the said Robert W. Archbald has acted as such United States district judge and judge of the United States Commerce Court he, the said Robert W. Archbald, at divers times and places, has sought wrongfully to obtain credit from and through certain persons who were interested in the result of suits then pending and suits that had been pending in the court over which he presided as judge of the district court, and in suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, of which the said Robert W. Archbald is a member.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being United States circuit judge and being then and there a judge of the United States Commerce Court, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and places, did undertake to carry on a general business for speculation and profit in the purchase and sale of culm dumps, coal lands, and other coal properties, and for a valuable consideration to compromise litigation pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in the furtherance of his efforts to compromise such litigation and of his speculations in coal properties, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as a judge of the said United States Commerce Court to induce the officers of the Erie Railroad Co., the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., the Lackawanna & Wyoming Valley Railroad Co., and other railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, respectively, to enter into various and divers contracts and agreements in which he was then and there financially interested with divers persons, to wit, Edward J. Williams, John Henry Jones, Thomas H. Jones, George M. Watson, and others, without disclosing his said interest therein on the face of the contract, but which interest was well known to the officers and agents of said railroad companies.

That the said Robert W. Archbald did not invest any money or other thing of value in consideration of any interest acquired or sought to be acquired by him in securing or in attempting to secure such contracts or agreements or properties as aforesaid, but used his influence as such judge with the contracting parties thereto, and received an interest in said contracts, agreements, and properties in consideration of such influence in aiding and assisting in securing same.

That the said several railroad companies were and are engaged in interstate commerce, and at the time of the execution of the several contracts and agreements aforesaid and of entering into negotiations looking to such agreements had divers suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, and that the conduct and efforts of the said Robert W. Archbald in endeavoring to secure and in securing such contracts and agreements from said railroad companies was continuous and persistent from the said 31st day of March, 1911, to about the 15th day of April, 1912.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I beg to say, for the benefit of the Members of the House, that a thousand copies of this report, with the accompanying resolution, have been printed by the committee, so that any Member of the House desiring to have a copy of this report, with the accompanying resolution, may have the same by applying to the Committee on the Judiciary at its rooms in the House Office Building.

CHIEF CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., July 8, 1912.

To the Speaker of the House:

Desiring to be absent from my office for a short period of time, I hereby designate the Chief Clerk of the House, J. C. South, Esq., to sign all papers that may require my official signature, and to do all other acts under the rules and practice of the House to be done by the Clerk of the House.

Respectfully submitted.

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House.

JURISDICTION OF THE POLICE COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill 5271, to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the police court of the District of Columbia in certain cases.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the police court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction, concurrently with the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, of affrays and the keeping of a bawdy or disorderly house, and any person convicted of such an offense shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 2. That said police court shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with said supreme court of threats to do bodily harm, and any person convicted of such offense shall be required to give bond to keep the peace for a period not exceeding six months, and in default of bond may be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding six months.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 808, CODE OF LAW FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it is the bill H. R. 21712, to amend section 808 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be amended by striking out section 808 and substituting therefor the following:

"SEC. 808. Rape: Whoever has carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will or whoever carnally knows and abuses a female child under the age of 12 years shall be deemed guilty of rape, and shall be imprisoned for not less than 5 nor more than 30 years: Provided, That in any case of rape the jury may add to their verdict the words 'with the death penalty,' in which case the punishment shall be death by hanging: Provided further, That if the jury fail to agree as to the punishment, the verdict of guilty shall be received and the punishment shall be imprisonment as provided in this section.

"SEC. 808 a. Carnal knowledge: Whoever carnally knows and abuses a female child between the ages of 12 and 16 years of age shall be imprisoned for not less than 1 nor more than 15 years.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this bill proposes to lessen the punishment for the crime of rape. The present punishment, where a girl is less than 16 years of age, can not be less than 5 years' imprisonment nor more than 30 years' imprisonment. This bill proposes to leave the punishment the same as to rape committed on a girl under the age of 12, but to lessen the punishment for rape committed on a girl over 12 and under 16. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what reason the District attorney gives for proposing the lessening of the punishment? As I understand, this bill was introduced at the request of the District attorney. I assume there must be some very good reason for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Where does the gentleman find the lessening of the punishment?

Mr. MANN. The present law provides that the punishment for rape committed against a girl under 16 years of age shall be not less than 5 years' imprisonment nor more than 30 years, unless the jury recommends capital punishment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman will note in the report, in the proposed new section, section 808a, there is a punishment for simple carnal knowledge of a girl between the ages of 12 and 16; whereas above, under section 808, if it be rape, then the crime will punished as rape. But this is an additional punishment for having carnal knowledge of a girl between 12 and 16 years of age with her consent. Instead of lessening it, the Attorney General endeavored to make the punishment greater.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is correct about that. This makes it rape when the girl is under 16 years of age, whether the offence is committed with or without her consent?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the present law is there no statute that would make it rape on a girl of that age if she consented?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No.

Mr. NORRIS. And this simply adds a new crime in rape?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 842, CODE OF LAW, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to call up the bill (H. R. 21710) to amend section 842 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 842 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be amended as follows:

"SEC. 842. False pretenses: Whoever, by any false pretense, with intent to defraud, obtains from any person anything of value, or procures the execution and delivery of any instrument of writing or conveyance of real or personal property, or the signature of any person, as maker, indorser, or guarantor, to or upon any bond, bill, receipt, promissory note, draft, or check, or any other evidence of indebtedness, and whoever fraudulently sells, barters, or disposes of any bond, bill, receipt, promissory note, draft, or check, or other evidence of indebtedness, for value, knowing the same to be worthless, or knowing the signature of the maker, indorser, or guarantor thereof to have been obtained by any false pretenses, shall, if the value of the property or the sum or value of the money or property mentioned or described in the instrument so obtained, procured, sold, bartered, or disposed of is $35 or upward, be imprisoned not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years, or, if less than that sum, shall be fined not more than $200 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both. Any person who obtains any lodging, food, or accommodation at an inn, boarding house, or lodging house without paying therefor, with intent to defraud the proprietor or manager thereof, or who obtains credit at such an inn, boarding house, or lodging house by the use of any false pretense, or who, after obtaining credit or accommodation at such an inn, boarding house, or lodging house, absconds or surreptitiously removes his baggage therefrom without paying for his food, accommodation, or lodging, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia shall be fined not more than $100 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of said court."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtiss, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6191. An act to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6191. An act to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PASSENGER VEHICLES FOR HIRE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up now the bill (H. R. 22010) to amend the license law approved July 1, 1902, with respect to licenses of drivers of passenger vehicles for hire.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 11 of section 7 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following:

"That in the District of Columbia no person, not an employee of a railway or traction company, shall engage in driving or operating any passenger vehicle for hire, whether said vehicle be driven or propelled by an animal or animals, or by any other form of motive power, without first procuring a license from the assessor of the District of Columbia, which license shall not be issued except upon evidence satisfactory to him that the applicant is a person of good moral character.

"Each person licensed under the provisions of this amendment shall pay an annual license tax of $1.

"Application for such license shall be made to said assessor in such form as shall be prescribed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and no such license shall be issued until an investigation of the character of applicant shall have been made by a member of the Metropolitan police force, designated for this purpose by the major and superintendent of police, and a report of such investigation shall have been delivered to the assessor by said major and superintendent of police.

"Each annual license issued under the provisions of this act shall be numbered, and there shall be kept in the Metropolitan police department a record containing the name of each person so licensed, his annual license number, and all matters affecting his qualifications to be licensed hereunder.

"All passenger vehicles operated for hire, except passenger vehicles operated by railway or traction companies, shall carry, in such place as may be designated by the commissioners, a number corresponding with the number of the license issued to the driver or operator thereof, and of such character and dimensions as said commissioners shall prescribe.

"No license issued under the provisions of this act shall be assigned or transferred.

"Every person violating any of the provisions of this amendment shall be punished as provided in paragraph 47 of said section 7. In addition to such penalties, any license issued under the provisions of this amendment may be revoked by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon conviction of the licensee, in the proper court, of a violation of any of the provisions of this amendment, or of a violation of any law or regulation governing the maintenance or disposition upon the public streets of public vehicles for hire, or upon conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude; and also if, in the opinion of said commissioners, any licensee hereunder shall become disqualified or unfit to continue to drive or operate a public passenger vehicle for hire, for any cause or reason which might endanger the safety of passengers in the vehicle driven or operated by said licensee, or of the public, said commissioners may require said licensee to show cause why his license should not be revoked, and in such event shall grant a hearing to said licensee, who may be represented by counsel; and if, in the opinion of said commissioners, the public safety requires the revocation of such license they may revoke the same."

With the following amendments:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "a," insert the word "street," and after the word "railway" strike out the words "or traction."

On page 3, line 4, after the word "by," insert the word "street," and after the word "railway" strike out the words "or traction."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I understand this bill, it provides for the licensing of drivers of vehicles for the carrying of passengers for hire and is an amendment to paragraph 11 of the act of 1902.

After going over the matter, I do not feel certain whether this amendment would apply to livery stables and to the keepers of auto establishments or not.

Paragraph 11 of the act of 1902 covers the proprietors or owners of hacks, coaches, omnibuses, carriages, wagons, and other passenger vehicles for hire.

Paragraph 12 of the same act covers proprietors or owners of livery stables.

The act now in existence provides that the driver's license shall have the same number as the vehicle license. That is, the badge now required of the driver must have the same number as the license number of the vehicle. This proposes that the vehicle shall have the same number as the number of the driver.

It is perfectly patent that if this amendment applies to the keepers of automobiles for hire it is not a practicable amendment. Whether it does or not, I do not know. I am not seeking to oppose the bill, but I call attention to that situation.

It is impossible for the same man always to drive an automobile. Here you license the individual and provide that no one else can operate the machine or drive the team except the person who has the license.

Mr. KAHN. When he quits he takes away his number and gives it to another machine if he goes into the employ of somebody else.

Mr. MANN. Suppose he does not quit?

Mr. KAHN. Then he continues with his number.

Mr. MANN. He can not operate the machine all day long.

Mr. KAHN. He can operate it a good part of the day, and I understand that the chauffeurs who run machines do operate them most of the day. But, under this bill, if another man were to come in his place the second man would have to take off the first man's number and put his own number on the machine. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether, in his judgment, there should not be a clause in this bill to repeal the provision of the license law which provides for certain specific numbers for automobiles and carriages? Is there not a conflict between the general license law, which compels a man to get a number which he carries on his machine during the entire year, as I understand it, and this measure, which compels him to get a number corresponding with the number of the license of the chauffeur?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This bill was prepared and sent up to the committee by the chief of police, Maj. Sylvester.

Mr. MANN. I understand it was prepared by the District officials.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. The committee went over it, and in going over it we apprehended some conflict between this bill and the law sought to be amended. We finally reached the conclusion, however, that there was no conflict. This bill simply says that no person shall be authorized to drive one of these machines for hire until he has been authorized so to do after an inquiry into his qualifications, and has paid a fee of $1. As drafted down at the District Building, it could have related to motormen of street cars. The bill has been so changed that it does not apply to them.

In the larger cities over the country a great many crimes have been committed by people who took taxicabs or automobiles for the purpose of getting to the place of the crime and getting away from it.

This bill has for its object, as explained to me by the city authorities, the fact that many criminals become chauffeurs and drivers of taxicabs that they may better cooperate with their confederates. If this bill is adopted, then any taxicab company, or anybody else running machines for hire, can not secure a driver for them until he has been approved by the police authorities.

Mr. MANN. As I understand this bill—take the case of a garage keeping automobiles for hire; they will have machines that are numbered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I do not believe that there is anything in this bill which interferes with the original law as to privately owned machines.

Mr. MANN. I think there is nothing in the bill that covers privately owned machines; only those kept for hire.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Therefore the driver of a taxicab used for hire does not have to have the same number as the taxicab, if this becomes a law. The driver of the taxicab can step out at any time he pleases.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, now the driver of a machine does not have to display his personal number on the machine. The purpose of this bill is to require that there shall be displayed conspicuously on the machine itself, or on the rig, whatever it is, the personal number of the driver, so as to identify in every case the driver of the rig or machine.

Mr. KAHN. When a machine is put into commission in the District of Columbia——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Private or public?

Mr. KAHN. Private or public, it is given a number at the license office.

Mr. MANN. I think the public machines are not given a number.

Mr. KAHN. The public machines are all numbered; every taxicab, every public carriage, has a number in the District of Columbia at the present time. All the taxicabs have numbers, and I presume that is provided for under the general license law. Now, would this bill cause a conflict between that law and this in the matter of numbers? And would it not lead to confusion?

Mr. MANN. It would not, but if the gentleman from California is correct, it would cause two numbers to be displayed on the machine. I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Kentucky, without meaning to be hypercritical. Where the gentleman reports a bill of this kind which has been prepared by the District authorities, I suggest that he insert in the report either a letter from the officials or some kind of a statement from them showing the purpose which they seek to accomplish. It would be a matter of great convenience, and in this case the report gives no information.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think I have correctly stated the real demand for this legislation.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman about that, but the question is whether it accomplishes the purpose. If we had a statement from the officials we could tell better about it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments.

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 11, after "a" and "railway," insert the word "street"; in same line strike out "or traction"; in same line, after the word "company," insert a comma.

Page 2, line 24, after the word "by," insert "street"; same line strike out "or traction."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FOURTEENTH STREET NE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills relating to the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 22648) to authorize the change of the location of Fourteenth Street NE., District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to prepare a new highway plan for Fourteenth Street NE., between Otis and Varnum Streets, and for such change in other streets so far as it may be necessary to connect said streets with the new location of Fourteenth Street, so as to avoid improvements lying in close proximity to said Fourteenth Street as now proposed, if extended, and so that the new location of said street will be in a straight line between the intersections of Otis and Fourteenth Streets and Varnum and Fourteenth Streets, under the provisions contained in the act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and an amendment to said act approved June 28, 1898, and that upon the completion and recording of said new highway plan it shall take the place of and stand for any previous plan for said streets.

SEC. 2. That whenever the owners of the land comprised in that portion of the new location of Fourteenth Street NE. authorized herein, lying south of Randolph Street, shall dedicate the same to the District of Columbia to be used as a public highway, in a manner approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the said commissioners be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to vacate and abandon as a public highway all of Fourteenth Street NE. now publicly owned lying between Otis and Randolph Streets, and not included in the new location of Fourteenth Street authorized herein; that part of Perry Street NE. lying between the easterly line of Fourteenth Street as now located and the westerly line of tract of land designated as parcel 146–2 in book of assessment and taxation in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia; and that part of Quincy Street NE., lying between the westerly line of Fourteenth Street as now located and the easterly line of the new location of Fourteenth Street authorized herein; and the title to the land contained in said abandoned part of public highway shall revert to the owners of the land abutting thereon.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is recommended by the District Commissioners. It changes the location of Fourteenth Street and straightens it out somewhat. There is a parcel of land used as a Franciscan Monastery in the section of Washington where this street is located, and if this bill be passed it will enable the commissioners to lay out the street in a straight line so as not to interfere with the property of that monastery.

The monastery has been there a long time, and the improvement is desired by the Commissioners of the District and by everybody who lives in that vicinity.

Mr. SISSON. How much will it cost?

Mr. KAHN. There is no cost to the District.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there have been at times various propositions before the House authorizing the commissioners to prepare new highway plans in different portions of the District, some of which have been hotly controverted.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is there any controversy over this?

Mr. KAHN. None whatever. The people in the vicinity where the changes are to be made all favor it, and there is no opposition to it from any source. No protest has been received in the committee from anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further general debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EXTENSION OF UNDERWOOD STREET NW.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (S. 23) to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within six months after the dedication, in accordance with law, of the land necessary to widen Underwood Street from its present western terminus west of Eighth Street west to Seventh Street west, to its full width of 90 feet, as laid down on the permanent system of highways plan, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary to extend said Underwood Street from its present western terminus west of Eighth Street west to the Piney Branch Road, with a width of 90 feet, as laid down on the permanent system of highways plan: Provided, That if the dedication referred to herein shall have been made prior to the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to institute the condemnation provided for herein within six months after the passage of this act: Provided further, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits, and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is recommended by the commissioners, and there are no protests against it from any source.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It is quite possible that under the circumstances the inquiry is not pertinent, and yet I wondered whether the proposed extension of Underwood Street met with the approval of Mr. Bryan? [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. I would refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think the gentleman from Alabama ought to be called upon to state his case. He is in the hands of his managers, and he is not required to make any personal reference to a thing of this sort. He requires no defense from anybody, but I wondered if the bill had met with the approval I speak of. I made the inquiry in good faith. A few days ago I really hoped that there might be a good deal in the extension of Underwood Street. I suppose now it is not important whether Mr. Bryan has approved it or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I might say to the House that during two Congresses I have sought to defeat the passage of this bill. The street has now been dedicated for its entire length, except a very small portion which will enable those who may hereafter live upon the street or have use for it to get to the railroad station. I have changed my attitude from opposing it to now being in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

METROPOLITAN COACH CO.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 2904) to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby empowered to regulate and control the character of the vehicles and equipment to be used by the Metropolitan Coach Co. of the District of Columbia and the operation of said vehicles by said company.

SEC. 2. That said commissioners are hereby given authority to issue such permits or licenses for the operation of said vehicles as may be necessary to carry this act into effect, and for cause shown to revoke the same, and further to make, alter, or amend from time to time, reasonable rules, regulations, and orders for the equipment and operation of said vehicles, which rules and regulations and orders when so made shall be valid and binding on the said Metropolitan Coach Co. and upon all persons.

SEC. 3. That said company shall provide and furnish at all times such service and facilities as shall be reasonably safe and adequate; and it shall at all times maintain its vehicles in good and proper repair, neat and clean, free from offensive smoke, noise, and odors, in a sanitary condition, sufficient in number, and reasonably comfortable and convenient. The company shall operate its vehicles over a route or routes approved by the commissioners, or to be approved by them, so as to give expeditious passage to all persons desiring to use the same, and on such time schedule or schedules and for such rates and charges as said commissioners may from time to time fix and determine. The said commissioners shall have power by a rule or rules from time to time to require and compel obedience to the provisions of this section after notice to and opportunity given said company to be heard.

SEC. 4. That said Metropolitan Coach Co. and its officers and employees are hereby required to obey all the provisions of this act and such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders as may be made by said commissioners, and if said company or its officers or employees violate any provision of this act or any of said rules, regulations, or orders made by said commissioners, or permit such violation, said company or each of said officers or employees shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100, and prosecution for each of said violations shall be made on information in the name of the District of Columbia, filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or one of his assistants.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall be effective on and after the 1st day of January, 1912, and, in addition to the penalties in this act provided, the failure of the Metropolitan Coach Co. at any time or times hereafter to comply with the terms hereof shall make it unlawful for it to operate its vehicles over its route, and if said company shall, within a period of 30 days of notice thereof, fail to comply with any of said rules, regulations, or orders, made by said commissioners, its right to operate said vehicles shall terminate without notice, and the commissioners are directed thereupon to prevent the use of the public highways by said company.

SEC. 6. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this bill was reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON]. He is not here at the present time to explain it, and therefore I shall endeavor to give the committee an idea of the purpose of the bill. At the present time the Metropolitan Coach Co. is operating a line of busses, beginning at the corner of Sixteenth and U Streets NW., going down Sixteenth Street to Massachusetts Avenue, down Massachusetts Avenue to Fifteenth Street, down Fifteenth Street to K Street, down K Street to Fifteenth Street, and down Fifteenth Street to Pennsylvania Avenue; thence westward along Pennsylvania Avenue to Seventeenth Street, down Seventeenth Street to F Street, and along F Street to Twenty-second Street NW., and return. The vehicles that the company owns are rather old-fashioned and dilapidated looking. The company has been operating at a loss for many years. The section of the company's franchise from Fifteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, out Pennsylvania Avenue to Seventeenth Street, down Seventeenth Street to F, and out F to Twenty-second is pretty well covered now by the street railroads of the city of Washington, and the company finds that that section of its line is altogether unprofitable. The company, through its officers and attorneys, has appeared before the Committee on the District of Columbia and has given assurances that if it can secure a franchise allowing it to go from Sixteenth and U Street down its old route as far as Pennsylvania Avenue and Fifteenth Street it will put on new busses that will run on regular schedule time, and that it will give the people of Sixteenth Street an excellent service.

Sixteenth Street, as you all know, has no street-railroad service at all. The only transportation service it has is this bus line. The chairman of the committee [Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky] suggests that there is no nearer service on Sixteenth Street than along Fourteenth Street, two blocks to the east—and they are rather long blocks—or along Connecticut Avenue, which is some distance to the west; so that Sixteenth Street really should have a good service. The committee has prepared some amendments to the bill which will allow this company to interchange transfers with the Capital Traction Co. and also with the Washington Railway and Electric Co., so that a passenger using this line will be able to go out F Street to Twenty-second, or even to Georgetown, or will be able to take the New York Avenue line and go easterly out to the District line. The committee favors the bill, and I believe it has the indorsement of the District Commissioners.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When they say they agree to furnish new busses, does that mean really new busses or busses 50 years old?

Mr. KAHN. No; the gentlemen who appeared for the company before the committee said that they felt that here was an opportunity to rehabilitate the line. These men who have invested their money in it have done so in good faith, and it has been operated at a loss steadily. They say they will put additional money in it and furnish new busses, with up-to-date, modern improvements, and will try to give the city of Washington—in fact, will give the city of Washington—a good service along that street.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At what fare?

Mr. KAHN. Six tickets for a quarter or 5 cents for a single fare.

Mr. BUTLER. How many omnibuses have they in operation now?

Mr. KAHN. I think they have two in operation.

Mr. BUTLER. Are they going to increase the number or the size?

Mr. KAHN. It is intended to increase the number.

Mr. BUTLER. And not the size?

Mr. KAHN. I presume they may increase the size, but they certainly intend to put more on the line.

Mr. BUTLER. And patch the roofs.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in relation to this bill. I heartily approve everything the gentleman from California has said, and I am speaking about this matter simply because I have been watching this line during its experimental stage and I know it is a fact that the line has lost money. It had to try out different sorts of busses and lost a lot of money in doing so; and I think if the gentleman from Ohio knew how hard these people have tried to succeed he would not think for a moment there was anything in the words "new busses," but that new improvements is what is meant.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman says they are experimental. If they would come down to some used perhaps in the last 20 or 30 years, why——

Mr. MANN. These busses they have now are new, are they not? How old are they?

Mr. KAHN. Three or four years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The management says now it has found one which will work on the streets.

Mr. SIMS. Persons who have lived on Sixteenth Street, as I have, know it is very inconvenient to have to go over two blocks to the west to Connecticut Avenue or over to Fourteenth Street to get to the car lines. Besides, these busses are not as dangerous as a street car. There never ought to be a street car line on Sixteenth Street.

Mr. BUTLER. They can not run over their own shadows.

Mr. SIMS. I do think this line is a proper enterprise, and ought to be encouraged. It is very desirable to have this supplemental bus service in connection with the street car lines, without the danger and noise that follows the installment of street car tracks upon streets not now having them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am glad to know that the gentleman believes that there is now some kind of an automobile that is not dangerous.

Mr. SIMS. The automobile itself never was dangerous. It is only the crank who runs it that makes it dangerous.

Mr. MANN. They have to have cranks, or they could not run.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Illinois is "literally correct," as he always is.

Mr. MANN. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. After all, the question is, What is the economical method of transportation. Is it practicable to carry passengers in the city by this method? Is it practicable to carry passengers in a city in large numbers in any way except upon rails as laid in the streets?

Mr. KAHN. I think, if the gentleman will recall, there is a motor bus line which runs up Fifth Avenue in New York City, and in the city of London practically all——

Mr. MANN. There is no use in citing the city of London, because busses there are being driven out.

Mr. KAHN. The old horse busses are disappearing; they are giving place to motor busses, such as it is proposed to run on this street.

Mr. MANN. They have given place to underground street car lines.

Mr. KAHN. There are a few tube lines, as they call them, but the number of busses along the Strand and Fleet Street is exceedingly large, and a man is kept pretty busy dodging them.

Mr. MANN. It is one part of the question of economy whether they can operate at a profit to themselves. The other question is whether they can operate at a profit to the public. A street car line improves its rails, and cars run upon them, and they have to be obtained by the street car company. The bus line runs upon an asphalt pavement put in at public expense, and it wears out. With the asphalt pavement or other pavement the public has to do the maintenance.

Mr. KAHN. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not think a motor bus of this kind is near so hard on the streets as those heavy so-called "chump chariots" which are going around showing the visitors to the city the sights at so much per head.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It occurs to me, if the gentleman will indulge me a moment, that it should not matter to the Congress whether it is profitable to the owners of the herdic line or not. They are anxious for this bill to pass; and, after it has passed, it gives the commissioners the right to compel them to operate.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not think that I have any opposition to the bill. I think anything that will improve the service up there will be good, but I doubt whether it will ever be very satisfactory.

Mr. KAHN. The question in my mind is whether they will be able to do it at the small price they are asking, but they seem to think there is enough business to warrant the experiment, and they are willing to put their money in it.

Mr. MANN. As to the regulations in regard to the transfers between this car line and the street car line——

Mr. KAHN. I dare say the Capital Traction Co. may fight it in the courts, but it is probable an arrangement can be made whereby the transfer facilities will be accorded. The motor bus company has a transfer arrangement with the Connecticut Avenue line.

Mr. SIMS. And with the Washington Electric Co., which was put on by legislation in Congress and which they have always lived up to.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says it is already provided. I would think that it is not provided for completely, or it would not be here.

Mr. KAHN. It is provided for at the corner of Fifteenth and H Streets NW.

Mr. MANN. The question I asked was whether you could provide in this bill that these companies should give transfers to this company or whether you would have to amend the franchise under which the street car companies operate? I take it those laws are subject to amendment. This, of course, does not purport to be an amendment to the original law.

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. MANN. I think we decided in our city that we had the right to require absolutely transfers between any street car lines, within the old city limits anyhow.

Mr. KAHN. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] said a moment ago, when this company undertook to change this line from a horse bus line to a motor bus line, the House at that time put a provision in the bill compelling the Washington Electric Co. to interchange transfers at the corner of Fifteenth and H Streets NW. The railroad company accepted the proposition.

Mr. MANN. They always have had transfers there since I have known anything about it.

Mr. KAHN. It was simply done by agreement, as I recall it; never by law. Therefore we put it into the law. The street car company never in any way attempted to get around it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think the Capital Traction Co. will, either.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, before the matter is disposed of, I desire to say on the part of the committee that there has never been any objection in the committee to this bill. A large number of pastors of churches in that section have earnestly sought the passage of the bill. I say for the committee that the bill would long ago have been brought up in this House for passage, except for some very objectionable lobbying that was done with the committee concerning the bill. In the beginning there were lobbyists who opposed the passage of the bill and who could give no sufficient reason for their opposition.

In a little while those same lobbyists who had just opposed the bill made miserable the life of nearly every man upon that committee, urging its passage. Why these particular lobbyists changed front we have never been able to discover, but it was a character of lobbying that the committee determined to discourage, and even went so far as to delay the passage of a good bill for the purpose of thus saying to the lobbyists that they must quit that objectionable system of lobbying; that no bill for which they lobbied would ever get through that committee. That character of lobbying ceased several weeks ago, and, in consequence of its cessation, the bill has been called up to-day for passage.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman's statement is rather surprising. I assume that this is not a very large company or one that has a very large capital. Its only assets are two large automobiles?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and the franchise.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; and the franchise.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that the company itself has done practically no lobbying in regard to this bill. The lobbying was done by people apparently on the outside—people who made themselves objectionable to practically every member of the committee.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What reasons were advanced for their action?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We can only guess at the motives of those who were lobbying against the passage of the bill at the beginning, and we can only guess as to why they changed their attitude from opposing the bill to being in favor of it. Nevertheless, that has been done, and those who were fighting it at first are now its most ardent advocates, without being able to give any reason for their change of heart. They have annoyed the committee to the extent that the committee was disposed at one time to defeat this bill because of objectionable lobbying.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that now the committee is for the bill, in spite of the opposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That said commissioners are hereby given authority to issue such permits or licenses for the operation of said vehicles as may be necessary to carry this act into effect, and for cause shown to revoke the same, and further to make, alter, or amend from time to time, reasonable rules, regulations, and orders for the equipment and operation of said vehicles, which rules and regulations and orders when so made shall be valid and binding on the said Metropolitan Coach Co. and upon all persons.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk correct the spelling of the word "vehicles" in line 3 of page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That said company shall provide and furnish at all times such service and facilities as shall be reasonably safe and adequate; and it shall at all times maintain its vehicles in good and proper repair, neat and clean, free from offensive smoke, noise, and odors, in a sanitary condition, sufficient in number, and reasonably comfortable and convenient. The company shall operate its vehicles over a route or routes approved by the commissioners, or to be approved by them so as to give expeditious passage to all persons desiring to use the same, and on such time schedule or schedules and for such rates and charges as said commissioners may from time to time fix and determine. The said commissioners shall have power by a rule or rules from time to time to require and compel obedience to the provisions of this section after notice to and opportunity given said company to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the committee amendments.

The Clerk read the first committee amendment as follows:

Strike out, page 2, lines 16, 17, and 18, the words "over a route or routes approved by the commissioners, or to be approved by them."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in striking out in section 3 the language "over a route or routes approved by the commissioners or to be approved by them" is that proposed to be stricken out because the committee intends to cover that itself by amendment?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. The committee has drawn two amendments to cover that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, insert after the words "such" the word "reasonable."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 20, strike out the words "and for such rates and charges."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That said Metropolitan Coach Co. and its officers and employees are hereby required to obey all the provisions of this act and such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders as may be made by said commissioners, and if said company or its officers or employees violate any provision of this act or any of said rules, regulations, or orders made by said commissioners, or permit such violation, said company or each of said officers or employees shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100, and prosecution for each of said violations shall be made on information in the name of the District of Columbia, filed in the police court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or one of his assistants.

With the following committee amendment:

Insert after section 4 the following:

"SEC. 5. That the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co. shall follow its present route to Fifteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, and shall go thence west to Madison Place, north to H Street, east to Fifteenth Street, and thence to Sixteenth and U Streets, by the route followed coming south; and said company, if it so elects, shall be permitted, in lieu of sending its vehicles west on Pennsylvania Avenue, as above provided, to send them south on Fifteenth Street and east on Pennsylvania Avenue to Eighth Street west, and thence reverse to Sixteenth and U Streets.

"SEC. 6. That said company shall issue to all passengers received by it north of H Street NW., and desiring same, a transfer ticket to the cars of the Capital Traction Co. at the intersection of Fifteenth Street and New York Avenue and Pennsylvania Avenue NW., said transfer ticket to be good for passage on the cars of the Capital Traction Co. going south or west, and the said Capital Traction Co. shall receive and transport on its said cars said passengers on said transfer tickets without the payment of additional fare; and the said Capital Traction Co. shall issue to all its passengers desiring same, on cars going east on Pennsylvania Avenue and north on Fifteenth Street, at said intersection, a transfer ticket to the coaches of the said Metropolitan Coach Co., and the said Metropolitan Coach Co. shall receive and transport on its coaches said passengers on said transfer tickets without the payment of additional fare.

"SEC. 7. That said Metropolitan Coach Co. shall issue to all its passengers desiring same a transfer ticket to the cars of the Washington Railway & Electric Co. at the said intersection of Fifteenth Street, New York Avenue, and Pennsylvania Avenue NW., said transfer ticket to be good for passage on the cars of the said Washington Railway & Electric Co., and the said Washington Railway & Electric Co. shall receive and transport on its said cars said passengers on said transfer tickets without the payment of additional fare; and the said Washington Railway & Electric Co. shall issue to all its passengers desiring same at said intersection a transfer ticket to the coaches of the said Metropolitan Coach Co., and the said Metropolitan Coach Co. shall receive and transport on its coaches said passengers on said transfer ticket without the payment of additional fare.

"SEC. 8. That any company named herein that fails to comply with the requirements of sections 6 and 7 of this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100 for each violation thereof, and prosecutions shall be made as prescribed in section 4 of this act; that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall make and enforce the regulations necessary to carry the provisions of these sections into effect."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall be effective on and after the 1st day of January, 1912, and, in addition to the penalties in this act provided, the failure of the Metropolitan Coach Co. at any time or times hereafter to comply with the terms hereof shall make it unlawful for it to operate its vehicles over its route, and if said company shall, within a period of 30 days of notice thereof, fail to comply with any of said rules, regulations, or orders, made by said commissioners, its right to operate said vehicles shall terminate without notice, and the commissioners are directed thereupon to prevent the use of the public highways by said company.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 15, page 5, strike out the figure "5" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "9."

In lines 16 and 17, page 5, strike out the words "the 1st day of January, 1912," and insert in lieu thereof the words "six months from the date of its passage."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 6, in line 3, strike out the figure "6" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "10."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

BENNING ROAD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that we take up the bill (H. R. 6083) to amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Benning Road, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1908.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act for the widening of Benning Road, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1908, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out section 1 of said act and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That, under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within 90 days after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land necessary to widen Benning Road from Fifteenth Street east to Oklahoma Avenue, exclusive of the strip of land 30 feet wide acquired by the Columbia Railway Co. under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, entitled 'An act to authorize the extension eastwardly of the Columbia Railway.' The width of said Benning Road when widened to be 110 feet between the limits named, including the strip of land 30 feet wide acquired by the said Columbia Railway Co.; Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceeding as damages for and in respect of the land to be condemned for said extension, plus the costs and expenses of said proceeding, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits: And provided further, That nothing in said subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of said code shall be construed to authorize the jury to assess less than the aggregate amount of the damages awarded for and in respect of the land to be condemned and the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder: And provided further, That the said Columbia Railway Co., its successors or assigns, shall remove its tracks to the center of the street when widened, when required so to do by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a bill practically similar to this has passed the House in the last two or three Congresses. The Benning Road is now one of the main traveled roads of the District. Large number of vehicles use it constantly. From the old White House Station, as they call it, to Oklahoma Avenue the road is quite narrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is said to be narrower than the bridge across the river.

Mr. KAHN. As suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], the road is narrower than the bridge across the Eastern Branch. The railroad company which occupies the land immediately to the north of Benning Road was notified when applying for its franchise that in the years to come it would undoubtedly be necessary to widen the road, and the company took the franchise subject to that notice. The railroad company officials are the only people who have shown any disposition to antagonize the passage of this bill.

In certain places it is difficult to cross the railroad tracks from the lands north of the tracks to the road. It is proposed to widen the road to the north and to place the tracks more in the center of the road. In some parts of it there is practically only a narrow driveway alongside the railroad track. The right of way of the railroad is on the extreme northern border of the road, and is fenced off, so that it is exceedingly difficult at times for heavy vehicles to pass one another.

The House has heretofore passed similar legislation, and this is simply another effort to secure the enactment of a law that will enable a very important artery of travel to be widened to a sufficient width.

Mr. TILSON. Who is to pay the expense of the widening under this bill?

Mr. KAHN. The abutting property owners. That is the usual course that is pursued here in the District when a road or street is widened or extended.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the Benning Road proceed for some distance along what is practically a causeway over swampy land?

Mr. KAHN. Not the part provided for in this bill. To the east of Oklahoma Avenue the road goes down a rather sharp grade and then strikes some low land near the Eastern Branch.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the railroad company pay any part of the expense of widening?

Mr. KAHN. I imagine it will have to. It will have some of the benefit. The tracks will have to be moved.

Mr. WEEKS. It would not be necessary to widen the road if the tracks were not there, would it?

Mr. KAHN. It would be necessary to widen the road, because, as I understand it, the tracks are on a private right of way, fenced off from the highway in many places.

Mr. WEEKS. What is the policy which has been pursued in widening roads or streets under such conditions in the District?

Mr. KAHN. When the commissioners determine that a road ought to be widened they apply to Congress for the passage of a law giving them authority to proceed in rem to condemn the necessary property, and the accruing benefits and damages are adjusted between the abutting property owners.

Mr. WEEKS. By the commissioners?

Mr. KAHN. By the commissioners.

Mr. WEEKS. And do they assess some part of that expense upon all interests?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Including the street railway company?

Mr. KAHN. I believe so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says "I believe so," but he speaks it in a hopeful way. The street railway company now owns 30 feet of ground upon which its tracks are laid.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. How do you propose to require the street car company to pay for widening the road when you take their land, unless they be paid for their own land?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say that there is already a law by which, when this street is widened, it must take up that 30 feet.

Mr. MANN. This bill provides that when the road is widened the street car company shall move its tracks to the middle of the street whenever ordered to do so by the commissioners. Who, then, owns the private property now belonging to the street railway company that is not condemned?

Mr. KAHN. It will have to be condemned.

Mr. MANN. It is not condemned by this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I was about to say to the gentleman when interrupted that under existing law the 30-foot strip becomes a part of the street whenever widened.

Mr. MANN. That could be done by the street railway company by their consent, but we can not dedicate it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think it was a condition precedent to the acquirement of it.

Mr. MANN. I think likely that is covered by the original act. I remember when this original act passed. I remember the discussion that was had in regard to it. That was the bill where my distinguished friend from Tennessee, now sitting in front of me [Mr. SIMS], stopped horse racing in the District of Columbia by placing a rider upon a bill for the opening of a street, prohibiting the maintenance of horse racing, and which nobody thought would ever pass. That bill provided that we would condemn the land for the widening of Benning Street whenever one-half of the property necessary for its widening had been dedicated. Are the people there unwilling to dedicate?

Mr. KAHN. Some are.

Mr. MANN. The majority are.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If I understand correctly, no dedication is necessary. If the street were widened on the south side of the road, many houses would have to be interfered with, but it is to be widened on the north side by taking this 30-foot strip which the railroad now uses. Under existing law, whenever the street is widened they must then move their tracks to the center of the street and abandon to public use the 30-foot strip which they now use.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that this is to take the 30-foot strip owned by the railroad company.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Kentucky says that under the original grant of franchise there was a provision that when it should become necessary to widen Benning Road the street railway company would dedicate this 30-foot strip for that purpose; that that was a condition of the grant.

Mr. MANN. That may all be; I am not referring to that. The original act provided that we would condemn the balance whenever 50 per cent was dedicated. It is a somewhat unusual thing to widen a street to the width of 110 feet. It seems to me wholly unnecessary to have a width that great unless the people want it and show it by some form of dedication.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will recall, that road is the artery by which a great many of the truck farmers come into Washington, and it is also a street over which a great many heavy vehicles pass in order to take the refuse of the city to the crematory.

Mr. MANN. I have been out on the road lots of times, and I think there is no more occasion for a street 110 feet wide there than there is for a street 1,000 feet wide.

Mr. KAHN. The street car line may take 30 feet out of the center of the road, which will not make the street any too wide for the heavy traffic that goes over it.

Mr. MANN. When the street car line is moved to the center of the street, it has no occasion for the use of the 30 feet. Two tracks is all they need, and two tracks do not occupy 30 feet.

Mr. KAHN. No; but two tracks will occupy probably 15 or 17 feet.

Mr. MANN. A little more than that. It means in the end, of course, an enormous expense on the District in paving the street and a very large so-called planting space, which is left entirely unimproved.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, there is a very large traffic over it, and I daresay in the years to come the traffic will grow.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says a large traffic, but he does not mean a large traffic as compared to the traffic in the gentleman's city or in my city on streets not over half the width.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say frankly to the gentleman that about three months ago the chairman of the subcommittee on streets, Mr. ADAIR, took me over there about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, an hour in the day at which one would expect to see comparatively little traffic, and yet I was surprised to see a great number of heavy vehicles that were passing over that road—a constant procession of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there are several other bills which the committee would like to take up and have passed at this time, but because of the absence of gentlemen who have them in charge, or who originated them, and at their request I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and had directed him to report the same back, some with amendments and some without amendments, with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bills as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 22648. To authorize a change in the location of Fourteenth Street NE., in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 23. To authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2904. To confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co., with amendments.

The amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title by adding to the present title the words:

And to provide for transfers between said company and the Capital Traction Co. and the Washington Railway & Electric Co.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the title.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 6083. To amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Benning Road, and for other purposes, approved May 16, 1908."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] may address the House for 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

PROCEDURE IN CONTEMPT CASES.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will not concede courtesies he will not get them.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HENRY of Texas) there were—ayes 27, noes none.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the suggestion.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, it will take a good deal longer to get a call of the House than it would take to give the gentleman from Oklahoma a chance to speak, and I think that we might reach a compromise by which we might do both. To tell the honest truth about it, I will state to the gentleman from Texas I would like to have about 10 or 15 minutes myself.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think there will be no trouble about giving the gentleman time under the bill we propose to get up if that will be satisfactory. I believe that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will agree to that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that a quorum having been ascertained not to be present there is nothing the House can do by unanimous consent or otherwise except to develop a quorum or quit.

The SPEAKER. Really that is true.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the time asked for by the gentleman from Oklahoma would be accorded to him——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas, without any explanation, objected right off the bat.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is absolutely good——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I talked with the gentleman from Oklahoma about the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not talk to me.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees——

Mr. CLAYTON. For myself I would very much like to hear the gentleman from Oklahoma, because I want to know whether he is going to join the third party or be a Democrat or stand pat, and therefore I would like to hear him——

The SPEAKER. And the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. The membership of the House at the present time consists of 390 Members. There are four vacancies. It takes 196 Members to constitute a quorum. There are 197 Members present—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Fred T. Macomber (H. R. 19193, 61st Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

PROCEDURE IN CONTEMPT CASES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which is already at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 597 (H. Rept. 945).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider the bill (H. R. 22591) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911. That there shall be three hours' general debate on said bill and one substitute, and at the expiration of such time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and said substitute to final passage without any intervening motion except the motion to recommit.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 37.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 42, answered "present" 8, not voting 200, as follows:

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 140, the nays are 42, "present" 8, making 190 Members present, while 196 are necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a quorum is not present. I think under the rule an automatic call of the House is required.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think the call is automatic, Mr. Speaker, when a quorum fails to develop.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will send for the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 25, answered "present" 15, not voting 199, as follows:

Mr. RICHARDSON with Mr. SULLOWAY.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado with Mr. WEEKS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama with Mr. LAFFERTY.

During the roll call the following occurred:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARNER). The Chair will state that several Members have come to the Chair and have asked him whether they are simply to vote present, or whether they may vote on ordering the previous question. The Chair understands that the question now being voted on is the ordering of the previous question, and gentlemen may vote yea, nay, or present, as they may desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Under what rule are we proceeding?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the tally clerk has not thus far any record of the yea-and-nay votes. In view of that fact, I ask unanimous consent that the roll call so far be vacated in order that Members may have an opportunity to vote intelligently on this question.

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Of course they can change their votes after the roll call is completed.

Mr. MANN. The whole roll call is without precedent or rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will record the Members as they answer.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is this call for the purpose of voting on a pending question, or for the purpose of developing the presence or absence of a quorum? In other words, how may I vote?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not in order to interrupt a roll call.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is well taken.

Mr. MANN. I think it is not well taken, and I should like to be heard on that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that Members are voting on ordering the previous question.

Mr. MANN. What became of the other roll call, then?

The SPEAKER. There was no quorum here.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference. That does not affect the roll call.

The SPEAKER. The previous roll call amounted to nothing, because there was no quorum here.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference. The roll is still being called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already ruled that this vote is on ordering the previous question. If any gentleman differs with the Chair he has the right of appeal. The Clerk will proceed with the roll call.

At the conclusion of the roll call,

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted "Aye."

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 160, the noes are 27, present 11. A quorum is present. The ayes have it, and the previous question is ordered. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] does not seem to be present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to control the time on that side.

Mr. MANN. I suggest the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will be recognized to control the 20 minutes on that side. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The resolution now pending provides for the consideration of the contempt bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and the rule provides that immediately upon the adoption of the same there shall be three hours' general debate on the bill and substitute and that at the end of the general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered and the vote taken upon the bill and the substitute. That is all there is in this rule. The previous question has been ordered, and as soon as the debate of 40 minutes is exhausted and the rule adopted the House will begin consideration of the contempt bill. The proposed bill divides contempts into direct and indirect, and prescribes jury trials in the cases of indirect contempts.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is there to be another vote before the three hours' debate begins?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There is to be another vote on the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The next vote will be on the passage of this resolution?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The next vote will be on the adoption of this special rule or resolution, and if the resolution is adopted then the House will proceed to consider the contempt bill, and will debate it for three hours.

The SPEAKER. The vote on this rule will be taken in 37 minutes from now, provided, of course, that the debate occupies 37 minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. It is my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to speak briefly on the bill itself when it shall be before the House, assuming that it will come before the House. At this time I desire to say, in answer to inquiries made to me by gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber whether it is the desire of the managers of this bill to conclude the hearing upon it and to have a vote upon it to-night, that the Committee on the Judiciary asked some days ago for this special rule bringing this bill in. The committee did not anticipate its coming in to-day, but, speaking for the majority of the committee, we are glad that it is here. It being here, I hope the House will be patient enough to give it full consideration this afternoon and to act upon it to-night. I desire to say that it is the expectation that we will vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Whether or not the gentleman from Alabama has had the assurance of his side of the House and of the other side of the House, or the gentleman from Illinois, that they are not going to use the entire three hours of debate under the rule?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not had it in terms, but I may say that from personal conversation with gentlemen on this side and gentlemen on the other side I think the three hours will be consumed in the discussion of the merits of the main proposition when it comes before the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Did I understand the gentleman from Alabama to say that he desired to get a vote on the bill to-night?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is my desire.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that that would be very inconvenient to some Members on the Republican side of the House.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The Republicans have a reception to-night.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that fact; the Republicans have been very self-sacrificing—the Republicans as well as the Democrats have been very constant in attendance at this session.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that it would interfere with the program contemplated for to-night by our Republican friends. But now, being informed of that fact, I shall not insist upon going on to a vote to-night; but I hope that we may have at least one hour's discussion and consideration before we adjourn. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very drastic rule that is proposed here. The previous question has been ordered upon it so that it can not be amended. It provides that the House may talk, but it can not act; it is subject to all the charges that ever were made by gentlemen on that side of the House against this side of the House when this side was in control. It says you can talk for three hours, but you can not amend. The purpose of the rule is not merely to keep this side of the House from amending the bill but keeping that side of the House from amending the bill; a bill which does not meet the Democratic platform, which does not meet the Democratic promises in the past, and which they are afraid to throw open for amendment.

You have charged us in the past with Cannonism, with adopting rules which prevented amendment. I have heard Democratic Members of this House time and time again say that they never would vote for a rule which prevented them from offering an amendment or voting for an amendment, and yet you meekly surrender your individual rights and bow your head in shame to the yoke placed upon you by the gentleman from Texas.

You can go back to your homes where you made your campaign in favor of the right of the individual Member to offer an amendment and apologize to the men who voted for you and sent you here believing that you meant what you said.

There are more than 150 bills on the calendar, and you propose to pick out and make special orders these bills which the gentleman from Texas desires to have considered, and propose to have them considered so that nobody can amend them, so that you can not offer an amendment to the bill, so that we can not offer an amendment to the bill, so that everyone here must swallow the pill the way he prepares it. There never was a time in my service in this House of more than 15 years when a rule so drastic as this, or more drastic than this, was ever adopted.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that five of the minority members of the committee have agreed upon a substitute bill for this bill, and that the rule provides that the House may come to a vote on that substitute agreed upon by the five minority members?

Mr. MANN. I am aware of the fact; but we ought to have the same right to offer amendments as any five minority members on the committee. [Applause on the Republican side.] Any individual Member of this House ought to have a chance to offer an amendment upon five new sections of the judicial code, as important sections as can be written into law, and we ought not to be foreclosed because five of us perchance have agreed upon something. I am in favor of the right of the Member to offer an amendment, and of the right of this House to vote upon amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and as one of those Members who favor the bill to which this rule applies, I want to offer my protest against the rule itself. I am in favor of the bill. I think it suits me pretty well. I helped to frame it. I have joined with the majority in the report upon the bill. I would be glad to have the Committee on Rules bring in a rule here which would make this bill in order; but, Mr. Speaker, I want to give to those who oppose the bill the same right and the same privilege that I have always claimed for myself when I was opposed to legislation that was brought in. [Applause.] I have always contended—and I think the membership here will bear me out in the statement that I did so against the leadership on my side of the House—against any rule, particularly on a small bill like this, which, while it is important, is only three pages in length, which would prohibit the right that every man here ought to have to offer any amendment that he sees fit and that the membership generally ought to have the right to vote upon. This rule makes it impossible to propose any amendment to this bill, so that I am at least consistent in claiming that those who are opposed to me, those who are against this bill, ought to have the privilege of offering amendments and of voting upon those amendments. It seems to me that it is wrong for any majority to say, "We have agreed upon a certain bill, upon certain language, and we will not allow anybody in the House to even suggest an amendment." I have seen bills here that I have myself brought in which suited me very well, but on discussion I myself have voted for some amendments that I thought improved the bill. It might occur on this bill if an opportunity to offer amendments were presented; but under this rule no man here may offer an amendment.

The only amendment that can be voted on will be a substitute which the chairman says, and says truly, has been agreed upon by five members of the Committee on the Judiciary. That does not give to the great body of the membership here the right that we ought to insist upon. I have always opposed gag rule in the past, usually, it is true, when I was opposed to the bill to which it applied, but I am opposing a gag rule here and now that the majority are attempting to fasten upon a bill that I favor, a bill that I helped to frame and that I expect to vote for. As far as I know I would not now, unless convinced otherwise, vote in favor of any amendment that may be offered to this bill. As I said, the bill suits me. I believe it is a step in the right direction. I believe we ought to take it. I believe we owe it to the country to pass the bill, but I do not want those who are here, the same as I am, to be deprived of the right to offer an amendment if they see fit.

This bill, as I said, in only a little more than three pages in length. If instead of devoting three hours to general debate we had no general debate, but considered it under the five-minute rule and let every man who saw fit offer an amendment, we would get through with this bill in less than three hours. We can not deceive the country with the proposition that we allowed three hours of debate on a bill. Three hours of talk will not do anything. The way to legislate is to permit men to offer amendments and to vote on amendments. What is the use of debating a bill if you have decided in advance by a rule that it shall not be amended and can not be amended? That is to assume that your bill is perfect, and every man knows that we can not have perfection from human beings. Therefore it seems to me that we ought in the first place to have voted down the previous question, so that the rule might be amended, cutting out that part of it that provides that there shall be no amendment except the substitute, and let it be considered as all legislation ought to be considered, upon the floor of the House, giving to each Member the full right that he ought to have under the Constitution to offer whatever amendments he believed were proper, and to see that those amendments were voted upon.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to me—and it should be gratifying to all people who live under our system of jurisprudence, inherited, as it is, from the English-speaking people across the water—that now after many years of endeavor we are arriving at a time when we can place upon the statute books that much deserved and much desired and much merited measure which provides that no man in a criminal or quasi criminal case shall be mulcted and fined, or punished by confinement in jail, without a trial by jury when he shall demand it. [Applause.]

The first bill that I ever introduced into this House, seventeen years ago, when I came here as a new Member, was a bill to give a trial by jury in all cases of indirect contempt in the Federal courts, and which is referred to in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary and a copy of it presented in the hearing before that committee. It is true the committee have improved upon that bill and bills of like character. They have reported a bill which does not take away from the court its right to try violations of its orders or of its decrees, simply in the enforcement of the orders and decrees of the court, such as collecting money from officers of the courts who have it in their possession and will not pay it over; but the committee have gone to the heart of the contention and have reported a bill which, in my opinion, meets the demands of the people and of the country for trial by jury in criminal contempt cases as far as it should go. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not the time to discuss in detail this proposed measure. I had the honor, when the bill providing for the government of Alaska was being considered, in 1902, to offer and engraft upon that bill this amendment:

> In other cases of contempt the trial shall proceed upon testimony produced as in criminal cases, and the accused shall be entitled to be confronted with the witnesses against him, but such trial shall be by the court, or in the direction of the court, upon application of the accused, a trial by jury may be had as in any criminal case.

I could not force a majority on that side, a Republican majority, to accept anything further, but the people of Alaska, in this last new Territory of ours, have in their law which gave them the right when they are charged with criminal contempt to have a trial by jury. Yet what is granted in frozen Alaska is denied to the people of this great country and the courts of the country. We ought to welcome it, and I do welcome it. It was put in the Democratic platform of 1896 at Chicago and reiterated in the various platforms we have adopted, and reiterated with strength and firmness at Baltimore when we nominated a man who will next year take a seat in the White House. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we ought to be congratulated that the time has come when no man shall be punished and fined, when no man shall be imprisoned in a quasi criminal case except according to the terms of that great instrument wrung by our fathers from a reluctant King and handed down to us through blood and struggle to be preserved as a paladium of the liberties of our people and every English-speaking man. Mr. Speaker, this is the provision of our platform of 1896:

We denounce arbitrary interference by Federal authority in local affairs as a violation of the Constitution of the United States and a crime against free institutions, and we especially object to government by injunction as a contempt of the laws of the United States and rights of the citizen, become legislators, judges, and executioners, and we approve of the bill passed at the last session of the United States Senate and now pending in the House of Representatives relative to contempts of court, providing for trials by jury in certain cases of contempt.

We have not failed to call attention to these abuses. I have no attack to make upon the courts; I have no attack to make upon judges. They are human, but I would not leave in the hands of any judge the power to be the grand jury, to be the prosecutor, the trier, and the punisher of any man charged with a criminal offense. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the provisions of this bill. I expect to vote for it. If I had opportunity to offer amendments to it, I do not know that I would offer any; but, Mr. Speaker, I voted against the previous question and shall vote against this resolution, because the resolution cuts off the right to offer any amendment to this bill. And, Mr. Speaker, a greater principle is at stake there than even in the bill itself. It is no answer to say that this is a meritorious bill and therefore a gag rule is proper, for when that is done you have created a precedent which I now prophecy you will carry out in time to come and use these precedents for bad bills as well as good ones. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will shortly conclude this debate, and I am going to ask him to answer two or three questions, which I shall now propound. I shall ask him, as representing the Democratic majority, first, whether he, representing that majority, believes there is more consideration and better consideration of legislation under general debate than under the five-minute rule. If he is honest with himself, and I believe he is, I know he will agree with me when I say there is more real consideration of legislation in this House in one hour under the five-minute rule than there is in one week under general debate. [Applause on the Republican side.] Having answered that question, I want him next to answer this one: Why was not his rule so framed that instead of giving three hours of general debate there should not at least have been given one hour's consideration under the five-minute rule? I want him to answer why this rule is so prepared as to cut off all right of amendment. Have not you sufficient confidence in your own majority to trust your own membership upon that side of the House to support your bill as coming from the committee? If you have, why have not you given these other Members of the House the right to offer amendments under the five-minute rule? [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Democratic majority has taken the position that it has with reference to rules of this character. Ever since I have been a Member of this House I have fought against gag rules when the Republicans were in the majority, I have fought against them when the Democrats were in the majority, and I propose to fight against them so long as I remain a Member of the House of Representatives. What has come over the Democratic membership of this House—every one of you? At the last session of Congress you were fighting the very things for which you are voting now.

What excuse have you to go back to your constituents and talk about "Cannonism" and the things that existed during the last Congress and the one before that when you, time after time, are voting for exactly the same kind of rules that brought about a revolution in this House at the last session of Congress?

I noticed, Mr. Speaker, in the press a day or two ago that the distinguished Speaker of the House and the distinguished leader of the majority had communicated with the Democratic nominee for President with reference to legislation pending in the House at the present session, and I have wondered, Mr. Speaker, whether your Democratic nominee for President stands for rules of this character or whether he stands for real deliberation in the great House of Representatives. I hope he does not stand for rules of this character, for I am inclined to think that your candidate for President is just a little better than your party.

I shall not take further time. I have discussed this same question over and over again. I do not expect it to have any effect now, and I am inclined to think that for the present at least we must say of the Democratic majority as was said of old, "Ephraim is joined to his idols. Let him alone." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has four minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] nine.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] was kind enough to ask me one or two questions. I want to ask him a question or two. One is whether his nominee is better than his party, and who is his nominee? Is it Taft or Roosevelt?

Mr. LENROOT. I trust the gentleman will use some of his time in answering my questions before propounding questions to me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will do that. Of course, I knew the gentleman was not ready to answer that question.

Mr. Speaker, the simple truth is that for 15 years the American people have asked for legislation restoring the right of trial by jury to American citizens. For 15 years, when a Republican occupied the seat now occupied by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, and appointed the Rules Committee, we have besought you to give us legislation on this subject. And if your Speaker and his tyrannical Rules Committee, the creatures of his high authority, had given us this bill as now written, we would not have asked for the right to offer a single amendment. Every Democrat would have voted for it without protest, and we would have promptly voted for the previous question in order to give this law to the American people.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, I am distressed at the situation of the gentlemen on the other side. It grieves me to see my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] gag when we administer to him a sugar-coated dose of his own medicine. But since his party has stood in the way of relief of this kind, we have come to the conclusion that the sooner we meet the demand of the American people and write into the statutes this meritorious measure, which has been prepared by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and his committee, the better it will be for all citizens. Therefore the Committee on Rules has brought in a special rule, giving this House the right to discuss the bill for three hours under general debate. We have accorded to you the right to offer a substitute, which has been prepared and agreed upon by the Republican minority on the committee, and, more than that, after that substitute is voted down, as it should be, because it would destroy and emasculate this meritorious bill, you will have the right under the rule to offer a motion to recommit. Therefore you will have two opportunities to vote for measures that suit you and vote against this measure if you desire.

But gentlemen talk about amendments to the bill and complain that they have not the right to offer amendments, and yet do not propose a single one. Not one is suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], not one is suggested by the minority leader. And why? Simply because they know no amendment is necessary in order to make this bill meet the requirements of the American people.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is no amendment that is going to be offered, and the gentleman is not afraid of any amendment, then why does he prohibit by his rule the offering of an amendment?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. You can offer a substitute or you can move to recommit, if you want to do so, and put any amendment on that you desire.

Mr. NORRIS. That recognition would be given to the same men who bring in this substitute, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There is no use in doing a foolish thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Then why should we have three hours of general debate if you do not want to do a foolish thing? Why should we do a foolish thing like that when we know we can not have the opportunity that we desire?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think we ought to have even three minutes of general debate on this bill. It is so meritorious.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Then why does the gentleman ask for three hours? Why not have debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in that proposition, but I thought it well enough to question the gentleman from Nebraska for a few minutes, because there are some of us who are in doubt as to his views in the State of Nebraska, and we would like to hear from him.

Mr. NORRIS. Why did not the gentleman provide for that in the rule? I would be glad to tell the gentleman, if I had an opportunity, what my views are in the State of Nebraska; but I would be out of order by this rule.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman is out of order, he has been put out of order by the conditions in Nebraska, and not by this rule.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand the gentleman's remark.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I said if the gentleman is out of order it is not the Committee on Rules that has placed him out of order. It is the conditions in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct. I accept that statement.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is correct and perhaps true.

Mr. NORRIS. But that has not happened yet.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Gentlemen undertook to criticize the Committee on Rules and talk about it being an arbitrary body and speak of czars and such things. The simple truth is that the Committee on Rules as now constituted is but the humble instrument and agent of the Democratic Party and of the American people in order to get into this body meritorious measures like this, that have been suppressed by Mr. CANNON and those who stood by him during all his administration. We intend to pass this bill as it has been written by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and his colleagues, and restore to the people the right of trial by jury as the founders of this Government intended, and to destroy "government by injunction." And the sooner we get to it the better. When no man can offer an amendment that is tenable, when no one can suggest a change that is sensible, I say the sooner we vote on the proposition the better it is for the people. And when the time comes, after your substitute has been voted down and the roll is called, I expect to see all of the gentlemen on the other side hunt for cover and vote for this bill as it has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman answer why he did not permit one hour of debate under the five-minute rule?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman has not answered my first question yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. You have not answered his question, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. I beg to suggest that my question is germane to this rule that is now under consideration.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And I beg to suggest to the gentleman that my question is "pertinent."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the adoption of this resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CLAYTON. How long did the Speaker say?

The SPEAKER. One hour.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thought it was an hour and a half.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that, but no arrangement has been made.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent to have the time divided.

Mr. CLAYTON. That was why I made the inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, unless there is an agreement, nobody is entitled to more than an hour.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that unanimous consent be given that, of the three hours of general debate to be allowed, one-half of the time be controlled by myself and one-half be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], and that at the end of three hours the question be taken on a motion to recommit with a substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The rule provides for the offering of the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent that he control one-half of the three hours and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] control the other half. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is recognized.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. Has the bill been read?

Mr. CLAYTON. I believe it has not been read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. STERLING. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the Clerk also read the substitute, following the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Clerk will read both the bill and the substitute.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I assume that the time occupied in reading the bill will not be taken from the three hours' general debate.

The SPEAKER. No; it will not.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 22591) as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after section 268 thereof five new sections, to be numbered, respectively, 268 a, 268 b, 268 c, 268 d, and 268 e, reading as follows:

"SEC. 268 a. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 268 b. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused person is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

"In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury; in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

"If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them, as the court may direct; but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of $1,000, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months.

"SEC. 268 c. That the evidence taken upon the trial of any person so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon writ of error in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified as justice may require. Upon the granting of such writ of error execution of judgment shall be stayed, and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court or by any justice or any judge of any district court of the United States.

"SEC. 268 d. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 268 a of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

"SEC. 268 e. That no proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act."

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary,' approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after section 268 thereof seven new sections, to be numbered, respectively, 268 a, 268 b, 268 c, 268 d, 268 e, 268 f, and 268 g, reading as follows:

"'SEC. 268 a. That contempts of court are divided into two classes, direct contempts and indirect contempts, as hereinafter defined.

"'SEC. 268 b. That contempts committed in the presence of the court or of a judge at chambers are direct contempts. All other contempts are indirect contempts.

"'SEC. 268 c. A person charged with direct contempt of court, if found guilty, shall be punished summarily and judgment thereon shall be entered of record accordingly, which judgment shall contain a statement of the acts constituting the contempt and a statement, if any, of the accused relied on as a defense or made in extenuation of the offense and the sentence of the court in the case.

"'268 d. Any person charged with indirect contempt of court shall be given a written statement of the charge or charges against him specifically setting forth the acts on which the charge of contempt is predicated. Thereupon the accused shall be arraigned and his plea entered of record. If the accused should plead guilty to the charge the court shall enter judgment thereon and impose sentence in the case. If he pleads not guilty the court shall set the case for trial and admit the accused to bail until final determination of the case. The trial shall be by the court, and witnesses called and examined for and against the accused as in criminal cases. If the accused shall be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly and the punishment prescribed. Said punishment may be by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That in cases where the fine is payable to the United States the same shall not exceed the sum of $1,000 in any case; and in no case shall the term of imprisonment exceed six months.

"'SEC. 268 e. If any person who has entered a plea of not guilty to a charge of indirect contempt shall make affidavit that the judge before whom the case is set for trial in the first instance is prejudiced against him and that on account of such prejudice he believes he can not have a fair and impartial trial such judge shall designate forthwith some other judge to hear and determine the case.

"'SEC. 268 f. That the evidence taken on the trial of any person accused of indirect contempt shall be preserved by bill of exceptions and any judgment entered in such case may be reviewed on appeal or by writ of error as now provided by law in criminal cases and such judgment may be reversed or modified as justice may require. When an appeal is taken or a writ of error granted, execution of the judgment shall be stayed and the accused shall be admitted to bail in such sum as is fixed by the court.

"'SEC. 268 g. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all proceedings for contempt in all courts of the United States except the Supreme Court: Provided, That this act shall not affect any contempt proceedings pending at the time of the passage of this act.'"

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of gentlemen who have printed copies of the substitute in their hands to the fact that the substitute as read contains a correction which I send to the desk. The word "person," in line 1, on page 2, should be "presence."

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that that correction has already been made in the bill which was read from the Clerk's desk.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, after conference with my associate on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], and at the suggestion of several gentlemen on this side, as well as on that side, in view of the lateness of the hour, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 9, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 9, 1912.

(Continuation of legislative day of Saturday, July 6, 1912.)

At 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crane	Johnston, Ala.	Simmons
Bacon	Crawford	Jones	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Culberson	Lea	Smith, S. C.
Briggs	Cullom	Lodge	Smoot
Bristow	Curtis	Lorimer	Stephenson
Brown	Dillingham	McCumber	Thornton
Bryan	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Tillman
Burnham	Fletcher	Myers	Townsend
Burton	Gallinger	Overman	Warren
Chamberlain	Gardner	Page	Watson
Clapp	Gronna	Perkins	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Guggenheim	Pomerene	Williams
Clarke, Ark.	Heyburn	Shively	Works

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is detained by important business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, without stopping even to summarize the points attempted to be covered by the discussion up to the time of the recess yesterday, I will take up the thought then being presented and continue as rapidly as possible to a conclusion. I realize the tax on the Senate a review of the record in this case imposes, sift the chaff from the grain as much as we may. It has been my hope, inasmuch as it was made my duty to serve on this special committee—and in pursuance of that duty I was present 93½ days out of the 102 spent in examining the witnesses—to save my colleagues time and labor by presenting what seemed to me the material and important matters in as condensed a form as possible and setting forth, as I have done, the pages of the record where the testimony referred to can be found.

When we recessed I was proceeding to trace somewhat further the jack pot; then to consider briefly the conditions, political and otherwise, existing at the time of the election, which would include a consideration of the circumstances under which the Democrats voted for Mr. LORIMER; then the question of res adjudicata, and to finally show that bipartisan combinations are to some extent inevitable in Illinois. I had stated that Holstlaw had said to a number of members of the legislature that he intended to vote for Mr. LORIMER before he had his alleged conversation with Broderick regarding the $2,500.

The amount paid Holstlaw does not correspond with that mentioned, as stated, nor with amounts alleged to have been paid White, Beckemeyer, Luke, and Link, and there was no evidence of activity on the part of Broderick in the senatorial election; and all the circumstances, to say nothing of Broderick's denials, point to these transactions between Broderick and Holstlaw as separate and distinct from the "jack pot" and also separate from the senatorial election. The significant fact that Holstlaw posed as a "dry" man and yet carried all the "wet" counties and lost all the "dry" counties in his district, taken in connection with Broderick's business and association, would strikingly indicate that the liquor interests were taking care of his campaign expenses. This idea is further supported by the fact that Welch, a Republican saloon keeper at Carlyle, supported Holstlaw in his race for the senate. On any other theory these payments constituted a sheer and voluntary waste of money on Broderick's part.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I wish to suggest that Holstlaw also testified that his expenses in that election were $3.500.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am obliged to the Senator for that suggestion. In addition to what I have said, Holstlaw testified that his campaign expenses amounted to about $3,500 when he ran for the senate.

We can understand how Link swore he "considered it campaign money."

That is the testimony of Link. He considered the payment to him at St. Louis as campaign money.

The clear solution of the mystery surrounding Jandus and his cash, De Wolf and his Bible money, Blair and his baseball bills, Wheelan and his borrowing, referred to in the minority views, will be found in the fact that they were each allied with the "wet" side in their respective counties, arrayed against prohibition, and in some, if not all, instances were elected on that issue. The evidence shows local-option measures were before the legislature of 1909. Various other bills calculated to draw forth contributions were introduced, referred, and disposed of.

OTHERS UNDER SUSPICION SITUATED IN SIMILAR WAY.

Lee O'Neil Browne had been for a number of years attorney for the Thirty-ninth District of Liquor Dealers' Association (p. 4939).

Wheelan managed three campaigns for antiprohibition leagues against the prohibitionists (p. 4033).

De Wolf was the "wet" candidate and his opponent the "dry" candidate when he was elected (p. 5394). He was "a wet man on the liquor question," he said, in the forty-sixth general assembly (p. 5395).

Jandus was opposed to local option and was a member of the United Societies for Local Self-Government (pp. 4013, 4024–4025).

Wilson stood on the wet side. There were local option bills before the forty-fifth. forty-sixth, and forty-seventh general assemblies (pp. 3749–3829).

Luke was generally drunk. Link and Beckemeyer were not prohibitionists, neither was White. Beckemeyer voted "wet" on the local option bills in pursuance of instructions from home, he said (pp. 3005–3008).

Holstlaw being a deacon of the church was classed as a "dry" man, but was elected by "wet" counties.

Was this "jack pot" a liquor concoction?

Wilson, with Lee O'Neil Browne, one Traut, and one Hirscheimer were indicted in Sangamon County for conspiracy. "It was something in regard to a fish bill," he says (p. 3887). That indictment was dismissed. Beckemeyer and De Wolf were interested in that fish bill (p. 2877); they were on the committee handling it. Bauter Bros., wholesale fish dealers, operating on the Illinois River, were pleased to have the bill defeated and asked Beckemeyer "what was done with all the money that had been collected up and down the river there" (p. 2879). Joe Clark told Beckemeyer "that there was a pot collected among the fishermen on the Illinois River, and that it had been paid, he thought, to Foster, chairman of the committee, and it had never been turned into the general or larger jack pot, and that Foster and Browne were at outs about that" (p. 2879).

Evidently there were fish in the jackpot. Goldfish in alcohol was one form this "corruption" designated as "wholesale" took. There was nothing appertaining to the election of United States Senator about it. In addition to the above was the corporation act which the governor vetoed and which was calculated to yield considerable jack-pot money.

That some money was apportioned out after the legislature adjourned and paid over to certain members of the legislature there is evidence. That this was a common occurrence there is evidence. This record discloses quite clearly defined trails leading toward original sources of such supply in no wise connected with the election of Senator. Tracing it, according to the proofs, only blind alleys, unused paths running into insurmountable obstacles, lead in the direction of the senatorial election.

Shall we follow the plain, blazed, traveled way wherever it may lead, or shall we abandon that and wander about through the underbrush of doubt and uncertainty, hew our own path around the natural obstructions unguided to the point fixed only by suspicion and inference and preconceived notions?

I have pointed out the beaten route to the true origin of the money distributed.

CONDITIONS, POLITICAL AND OTHERWISE, AT THE TIME AND PLACE OF ELECTION.

Senator Isley, a Democrat, voted for Stringer on every ballot, made a speech the day of the election urging Democrats not to vote for a Republican, said he had no distinct knowledge on the subject of corruption in the legislature, never knew anyone who received anything for voting for Senator, and he further swore that "if there was any Democrat in the legislature who would be justified in voting for LORIMER it was George W. Alschuler" (p. 5545); that Hopkins was very bitter and cold toward Democrats; that LORIMER was popular with the Democrats (pp. 5527, 5543). He and Homer E. Shaw sought to organize Democrats against LORIMER and any other Republican (p. 6830). Welborn, Womack, and Shaw voted always for Stringer.

Homer E. Shaw, a Democratic member of the forty-sixth general assembly, said he heard "only such general talk of corruption in the forty-sixth general assembly as has been for the past 50 years in every legislature" (p. 6821). He has been in politics for 25 years. He testified that Hopkins was very unpopular with the Democrats, who were bitter against him (p. 6827); that Mr. LORIMER had a great many friends among the Democrats (p. 6828), growing out of his waterways advocacy. He further testified that "three or four days or a week before the election White told him he was going to vote for BILL LORIMER if he got a chance" (p. 6818). White voluntarily assured Mr. LORIMER he would vote for him some days before the election (p. 7646). This destroys White's story about Browne coming to his room on the night of May 24 proposing to pay money for his vote.

Lawrence B. Stringer, the Democratic nominee for United States Senator, was in Springfield all the while the legislature was in session (p. 2272), and he had no information given him as to any wrongdoing or improper or dishonest attempt to influence the vote of any member in the senatorial election (p. 2295). He further testified that Mr. LORIMER had a great many friends among the Democrats in the general assembly (p. 5527). Here were all these men actively and continuously fighting Mr. LORIMER and the Republicans generally, keeping close watch on every move by those of their own party, as well as of the Republican Party, and they had no information that money was being used or promised in connection with the senatorial election.

There is no ground to question the integrity of Democrats like Tippit, Alschuler, and others who voted for Mr. LORIMER.

There was no chance to elect a Democrat. It is absurd to claim that it was as reasonable to expect Republicans would go to the Democratic candidate as for Democrats to make a choice among Republicans when the Republicans had a majority of 50 on joint ballot.

Members of both the Browne and Tippit factions voted for Mr. LORIMER, as well as both those leaders.

The evidence clearly established a situation relative to the election under consideration which had no dependence whatever on corruption of any kind. This is expressed in the testimony of a number of responsible witnesses heretofore mentioned and indicated further by Mr. Isley and Mr. Tippit. There was no Republican in the State who stood as high with the Democrats as Mr. LORIMER, according to State Senator A. E. Isley, an attorney of Newton, Ill. (p. 5527).

Mr. Thomas Tippit, for six years a member of the Illinois General Assembly, and leader of one of the Democratic factions in the forty-sixth, composed of 26 Democrats, testified: "I could state further that it was my information, has been, and is now, that the election of Mr. LORIMER to the United States Senate was favored by Adlai E. Stevenson, late candidate for governor and former Vice President of these United States, and Mr. Louis Stevenson said to me that he would like the Democrats to vote for Mr. LORIMER because of what he had done for his father in the late election" (p. 4264).

He also testified that, "My understanding is that three-fourths, probably, of the Democratic central committee favored the election of Mr. LORIMER to the United States Senate. I think that is true" (p. 4265).

I apprehend, in view of this testimony, Members of the Senate, particularly those on this side of the Chamber, will not be able to follow the theory advanced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that something was wrong either with the heads or the morals of the Democrats who voted for LORIMER.

I submit that under these conditions the charge that principles and party were deserted under circumstances which showed "wholesale bribery had been resorted to in order to bring about that result" is not justified.

Such a contention can only be urged on the basis of Mayor Sapsea's notion in "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," that "proof, sir, must be built up stone by stone. As I say, the end crowns the work. It is not enough that justice should be morally certain; she must be immorally certain, legally, that is."

THE FORMER JUDGMENT PRECLUDES FURTHER ACTION.

This case has been adjudicated; the action taken March 3, 1911, was final and forever settled the question involved, certainly in the absence of new evidence of such a nature that, had it been introduced before, would or might have produced a different result.

This case was passed upon by the Senate of the Sixty-first Congress, the term expiring March 4, 1911. Some 30 changes had taken place in the membership of the Senate by the time the Sixty-second Congress convened. Owing to these changes this case was ordered retried—the alleged grounds being, however, that new evidence had been discovered, which, if presented and considered, would make a different case. Many Senators believed additional and newly discovered evidence existed, and in view of the charges made it would be advisable to make another investigation and ascertain what new facts could be uncovered. This action will likely serve as a precedent—although the Senate treats each case, apparently, from the standpoint of power and might—that is liable to plague us in future. In similar cases the Senate adopted the doctrine of res adjudicata as far back as 1858.

The change of the personnel of the Senate should not prompt a change of decision reached as judges acting in a judicial capacity any more than a change in the individual justices on the bench should of itself give grounds for the rehearing of a cause. Unless a different case is presented involving different facts or additional, material facts not known before, clearly it must be recognized as an unjust interference, wrongfully imposing expense and trouble, to repeatedly bring to the bar a Senator and require him time after time to defend his right to his seat in this body. If, in the Sixty-first Congress, he is tried, and again in the Sixty-second, can he not be in the Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth, and yearly to the end of his term? When is the judgment of the Senate to be conclusive, and forever bar any further proceedings to adjudicate the same question? The authorities uniformly hold that the rule of res adjudicata applies in this case, and is a complete answer to the resolution offered and now pending. The report of the committee sets forth a number of authorities, and I will not elaborate upon them. The Senate has the power to force a reexamination of the questions and a new vote by a new Senate on a resolution to the same effect as the one previously voted on, but that is not the same thing as having the legal or moral right to do so.

Certainly there is nothing in the present case, although thousands of pages of additional testimony, legal and illegal, relevant and irrelevant, admissible and inadmissible, competent and incompetent, were taken, which makes it stronger against the sitting Member than it was at the last trial. On the contrary, it is a weaker case than it was before, and made so by the testimony of Senator LORIMER and further light on general political conditions and further proof of perfidy on the part of White and the evidence of improper motives, malice, and desperation on the part of enemies of Mr. LORIMER.

I think the former judgment ought not to be disturbed, and that further inquiry is thereby precluded. The precedents directly in point are the leading cases mentioned in the report, which I simply call to the attention of the Senate, in the hope that they will not be ignored when the vote is taken.

The first is the case of Senators Fitch and Bright and Lane and McCarty, of Indiana, in the Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Congresses. (Taft's Senate Election Cases, 164; Buck's Senate Election Cases, 244.)

The doctrine was again applied in the case of Francis W. Sykes and George E. Spencer, decided by the Senate in the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses (Taft's Senate Election Cases, 556; Buck's Senate Election Cases, 611–633), in which the committee used this language in its report:

> The question having been definitely settled, it was considered by the committee that it was not competent to reopen it, and that it must be treated as res adjudicata.

In the du Pont case (1898) the question was squarely presented (Buck's Senate Election Cases, 818–874), and on reference of a memorial to again investigate the case, after holding that the Senate might review its decisions for fraud and for such causes as enable a court in direct proceedings to vacate a judgment, and that the Senate might overrule a legal doctrine pronounced in a former case, the committee said:

> But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their mind as to the law or fact which is involved.

On the application of Senator DU PONT to reopen the case, the committee unanimously decided that there had been an adjudication of it, "and that nothing further remained to be done," and the application was denied. Senator Hoar insisted the doctrine of res adjudicata should be applied in such cases, and although the adjudication had been by a majority of only one, he said the judgment of the Senate was "just as binding in law, in all constitutional vigor and potency, when it was rendered by one majority as when it was unanimous." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 29, pp. 2524, 2555, 1559, 1560.)

If you hold this case has not been finally disposed of it means nothing less than a decision that the Senate may try such a case and decide it once, then, at the same or the next session, or at the next term, after there has been a change in the membership of this body, try it again, and the next session try it again, and so continue until the Senator whose right to his seat is thus brought in question is exhausted by the pecuniary tax, mental and physical strain; broken financially and in health, he is forced to finally allow the trial to go by default or resign. In that way the case is determined and the conclusion is reached, not on the merits at all, but solely by the arbitrary, unjust exercise of power. If that be any sort of justice or any approach to proper practice, I confess my inability to see it. It is rather the Rob Roy plan—

> Let him take who has the power;
> Let him keep who can.

PUBLIC PREJUDICE MANUFACTURED.

We might as well recognize this is a newspaper war on Mr. LORIMER. "Let the people rule," the people being the Tribune, the News, and the Record-Herald, in Chicago. Here, "the people" is one man, who has access to the public through the press, being a front-page feature in all the newspapers; yonder, "the people" is another man who hires and puts in operation his news bureau to promote his own selfish and inordinate ambition. "Down with the boss" they cry, meaning the person making the demand wants all the room there is in which to play the "boss" to the limit himself.

A patriotic, courageous, unshackled, and unbiased press is the greatest beneficent force in modern civilization.

If malicious, tyrannical, or venal it becomes an influence terribly destructive and woefully bad.

This power may be a blessing incalculable, or it may be a curse unbearable. It may tremendously advance the highest good or become an insufferable nuisance.

Mr. Candidate wants an office. Whether it be constable or President, the first thing he must do is to organize a publicity bureau. The size and cost of this corresponds with the importance of the office in some degree, because the larger the office the more people must be impressed with the public and private virtues, the great ability, and other qualifications of Mr. Candidate.

If an opponent is to be got rid of the same method is the latest device. With such a bureau public opinion will be manufactured to order.

Industriously feed the kind of literature experts can prepare to a chain of newspapers extending across the country both ways, including the national weeklies as well as the dailies, and the result will be a public opinion made and sustained, for a time at least, as wanted.

It is easy to make charges so general and by such indirection they can not be disproved.

The specific charges in this case have been met; it is reasonable to exact proof of vague and broad insinuations and assertions before approving them.

We are told to "purge the Senate of LORIMER," who "represents the old régime." "Purge" for what? "The old régime" means what? "Represents" how? Where is the proof? We are given to understand there is a terrible situation here. May we not ask for some evidence of it?

He was elected by Democratic votes you say. Are there not other Republican Senators here who have been assisted by Democratic votes and against whose election no criticism is made on that account? Are there not Democratic Senators here who were elected by Republican votes the validity of whose elections has never been questioned? Can it be fairly claimed that this is such an exceptional case, after all, as to preclude good faith and honesty?

BIPARTISAN ACTION INEVITABLE AND NOT OUR AFFAIR.

Because of the alleged bipartisan action, the evils of "the machine," the "rule of the boss" are painted in frightful colors.

Let me tell you the constitution of Illinois opens the way for bipartisan action and facilitates, if it does not make inevitable, bipartisan combinations. If that be an unmitigated evil, the constitution of the State, and not WILLIAM LORIMER, is responsible for it. If that be a curse, the fundamental law of the State in its provisions for minority representation chains the political affairs of Illinois to the body of that death. You can not fasten the blame for that condition on any man. For instance, when it comes to elect three representatives from a given county, the electors, under the constitutional provision, are permitted to cast one vote for each of the three candidates or one and a half votes for two of them or three votes for one. That is the provision of the constitution. Can you ever escape bipartisanship arrangements and combinations under such a provision as that in any contest waged on practical political lines?

Illinois will never be free from bipartisan deals and combinations until her constitution is changed. I do not condemn the constitution. I thought it was a very good provision, when I first saw it, but I can see that in practical application it leads to the very thing the newspapers are arrayed against—bipartisan combinations. That is a question with which we have nothing to do. If a Senator be elected as a result of the operations of the law, and that is the real gravamen of the complaint, the Senate can afford no remedy if it would and ought not if it could. The commission of a sovereign State is entitled to some respect here.

SOLEMN STAND ON UNDISPUTED GROUND.

It appeals to a great many people for one to indulge in general indorsement of, and laboriously plead for, civic righteousness, clean politics, good intentions, patriotic, unselfish efforts, as if these were matters sane men would combat or draw in question. You need not raise your hands to high heaven and proclaim vehemently, and even violently, that you are for a good man as against a bad man, an honest man as against a rascal, a sincere man as against a trickster. This may impress some people as entitling the speaker to praise, but thinking people will know such a view ought to exist without argument and as a matter of course. Nor shall I concede that continuous repetition of self-evident, undisputed propositions is evidence of one's superior virtue.

Unless there is proof justifying it, I shall hold no man up as a "horrible example" because it strikes a popular chord to do so.

There is no evidence in this record of WILLIAM LORIMER'S misconduct, unfitness, or disqualification for the position for which the legislature of his State deliberately selected him. There is no evidence in this record that "predatory wealth" named him or has been instrumental in defending him.

I would like for some of those who find apparent relish in assailing him to point out somewhere in the record before us, or outside it, a fact indicative that he is not making in this case his own fight, single handed, and in a manly, frank way.

If he is the representative of "privilege," "special interests," "malefactors of great wealth," "predatory riches," it is extremely remarkable that some evidence of their sympathy and concern has not appeared.

That he is a Republican is scarcely a sufficient answer. I disagree with him absolutely in his views on economic, governmental, and political questions, but if that is to determine our action in this case our Republican friends, if they should adopt the same rule, might easily perpetuate the Republican majority in this body. The legislature may not have been in agreement with him on political questions, and yet it may have done what it conceived to be the best it could in the circumstances, and I do not see that corruption should be presumed.

All the platitudes about the necessity for maintaining the integrity of the Senate, which no one gainsays, all the abuse by the self-constituted censors of public men, all the protestations by the Honeythunders, will not create prejudice, favor, or fear to supplant in my vote the principle of simple justice.

The idea of "justice among the people" must embrace, not exclude, those in public life, must apply to each individual as well as all combined—the component parts as much as the entire body politic. Justice in this case demands the defeat of the resolution and the approval of the report of the committee.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, it is with a feeling of relief that I approach a period in the proceedings of the Senate when the question of the right of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] to his seat shall be determined. On the other hand, it is with a feeling of responsibility which is somewhat oppressive that I approach the discussion of this case, because of the great volume of testimony which has been taken and the multitudinous phases of it which demand examination.

The committee appointed to make the investigation devoted to it a vast amount of time, a vast amount of patience, and presented to the Senate a volume of testimony so large that it is impossible for any Member of this body to read it as a whole, or by use of the digest index to follow or comprehend all the lines of evidence and the subjects which were investigated.

The investigation has been full and complete. The committee employed as counsel Mr. John H. Marble, of this city, and Mr. John J. Healy, of Chicago, the latter having acted as counsel for the Helm committee, so called, a committee appointed by the Senate of the State of Illinois "to investigate alleged acts of bribery and official misconduct of members of the forty-seventh or forty-sixth general assemblies." Counsel were instructed to seek suggestions and secure information from every possible source, and were especially instructed to confer with the owners and managers of the Chicago Tribune, which has been the most aggressive factor in the prosecution against Senator LORIMER. They mingled freely with the representatives of that paper, both in Washington and in Chicago. For the committee I may say that during the entire time devoted to this work no member ever objected to any line of investigation suggested by another member of the committee or by counsel. And I want to add that while members of the committee sharply differ in judgment in reaching conclusions based upon the evidence, nothing has ever occurred to cast a shadow upon their personal relations or to disturb the harmony existing among them in the prosecution of the work. They have acted in perfect harmony, in perfect accord, and with a common purpose to secure the truth.

The committee made a report to the Senate which embodies its findings as to the facts connected with the election of Senator LORIMER. That report was prepared with care; in it references to the record are made, so that anyone may readily turn to the testimony and judge whether the statements are sustained; and the committee asks of the Senate fair consideration of the result of its work.

Two Senators who signed the report—Messrs. GAMBLE of South Dakota and JOHNSTON of Alabama—were members of the Burrows Committee, so called, the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which made the former investigation. Senator FLETCHER and myself were at that time members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but not of the subcommittee. We both joined, however, in the report of that committee that the story of Charles A. White, to the effect that Lee O'Neil Browne bribed him to vote for Mr. LORIMER, was a fabrication and wholly without foundation in fact. The fifth member of this committee joining in this report is the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who was not a member of the subcommittee or of the full committee at the time of the first investigation. As a Senator he then both spoke and voted against Senator LORIMER'S right to a seat in this body, but after hearing all of the evidence taken on this investigation he has been compelled to reverse his judgment, and has joined with the others whom I have mentioned in reporting that in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER they find no corruption.

With the presentation of this report and of such statements as the individual members of the committee may make to the Senate, their duty is done, their responsibility ceases. The responsibility is then transferred to the Senate to receive the facts and to act upon them in accordance with its judgment. I need not say that I am anxious to be of service to those who are not so familiar with the testimony as I may be, and for that reason I purpose to present a story of the circumstances and events leading up to Mr. LORIMER'S election and the charges made against its validity in their logical order.

Mr. President, it is impossible to understand the questions involved without considering the political conditions in the State of Illinois at the time of the election of Senator LORIMER by the legislature of that State on the 26th day of May, 1909. In discussing such conditions I shall have to refer to the political affiliations of a good many gentlemen in public life in Illinois, but in doing so I shall rely wholly upon the evidence taken during the investigation.

POLITICAL CONDITIONS AT TIME OF ELECTION.

The evidence shows that previous to 1904—I go back four years from the election of 1908—there had existed a strong personal and political friendship between Senator LORIMER and Gov. Deneen. They had worked together in many political campaigns; had fought many battles and won many victories. Gov. Deneen was admitted to the bar in 1886, and was made the attorney of the sanitary district of Chicago in 1895 at a salary of $5,000 per year. In 1896, and from thence on to 1904, Mr. Deneen was the State's attorney for Cook County. From his salary and fees collected he amassed a fortune of $300,000. He was warmly supported by Mr. LORIMER for both of these positions; and testified that his reelection to that office in 1900 came through Mr. LORIMER'S strong friendship for him and because he was able to overcome the opposition of his (LORIMER'S) friends to Deneen's nomination. That friendship continued unbroken down to 1904, when Mr. Deneen became an aspirant for the office of governor of Illinois. At that time it appeared to Mr. LORIMER that Mr. Deneen had deserted him politically and had gone over to what was called "the newspaper crowd" in Chicago in order to secure that support in his new ambition.

It is a conceded fact that for 20 years it has been the policy of the Chicago Tribune—and I am not saying this in criticism of the Tribune nor in approbation of it, for that matter—but for 20 years the policy of that paper has been, according to the testimony of its manager, Mr. James Keeley, to drive Mr. LORIMER out of public life and out of the politics of Illinois. Everyone connected with it——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. It was shown by the evidence that the Chicago Tribune had at practically every election at which Mr. LORIMER was a candidate for Congress supported him.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It did sometimes, as it supported the Republican ticket, and sometimes it did not; but does the Senator from Indiana deny the statement that I have just made?

Mr. KERN. What statement was that?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Of Mr. Keeley, as to the policy of the paper.

Mr. KERN. That is, as to the general policy of the paper?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. KERN. I do not deny it, but I was unable all the time to reconcile it with the fact that was conceded all around, as I understood, that while the Chicago Tribune opposed Mr. LORIMER at the primaries, it supported him almost universally at the elections as against the Democratic candidate, with one single exception, and in their editorials advised Republican voters and all the voters of the district to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That was undoubtedly true at times; but before I have finished I shall call attention to evidence on that matter, because Mr. Keeley testified, as I have said, that he regarded Mr. LORIMER as a malign influence; that it had been the policy of the Tribune, and of Mr. Medill McCormick, who preceded him as manager of that paper, continuously, persistently, and consistently, to drive Senator LORIMER out of politics in Illinois, and that every effort and influence possible had been employed in furtherance of that purpose.

The editor of the Record-Herald, Mr. Kohlsaat, testified that for 20 years he had been politically opposed to Mr. LORIMER. That paper is owned by Victor F. Lawson, who is also the owner of the Chicago Daily News, so that when we speak of the Chicago press we naturally think of those three great leading daily papers.

ELECTION OF 1904.

As we approach the election of 1904 we find that Mr. Deneen was a candidate for governor and was having the "newspaper support," so called, of Chicago. Gov. Yates was a candidate for reelection. Mr. LORIMER was supporting Mr. Lowden for that office. The now famous Republican State convention of that year extended over a period of four weeks before being able to make a nomination. During its continuance the situation became so acute that it took a recess of 10 days for consultation with the people. Gov. Yates, while unable to secure the nomination, held the balance of power in the convention and could control the nomination. He states in his testimony, in substance, that while he had no agreement with Gov. Deneen, and did not make a proposition to him or receive a promise from him before the act, yet there was an understanding between them that after he had thrown his influence to Gov. Deneen and thus secured his nomination for governor as against Mr. Lowden, he should have the support of Gov. Deneen two years later, in 1906, in a contest which he intended to make against the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] for a seat in this body. He testified that he failed to receive that support, and from that day to this he has been the bitter and persistent political enemy of Gov. Deneen. I mention this incident as evidence of one of the conditions which existed when the legislature of 1909 came together.

From 1904 to 1908 Mr. Deneen was governor of the State. The Republican Party in Illinois during those four years was divided. Gov. Deneen was naturally the leader of one faction and Senator LORIMER the leader of the other.

ELECTION OF 1908.

In 1908 Gov. Deneen was a candidate for reelection. Again ex-Gov. Yates loomed up against him as a candidate, and Mr. LORIMER was among Gov. Yates's supporters. The primary system had at that time been inaugurated and all these candidates went before the people. The situation was complicated by the fact that Senator Hopkins was a candidate for reelection to the United States Senate, and with the other candidates—Mr. Foss, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Webster—went before the same primaries as a candidate for that position. In that primary contest Gov. Yates and Mr. LORIMER warmly supported Senator Hopkins and his candidacy. Gov. Deneen also favored the candidacy of Mr. Hopkins; but after the primary election was over it appeared—and the evidence is undisputed—that Mr. Hopkins had failed utterly to return any of the favors which had been rendered to him by the respective candidates for the governorship, and had evidently disappointed both. From that time on there was a coldness toward Mr. Hopkins both on the part of Mr. Yates and Mr. LORIMER, and also on the part of Gov. Deneen.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. REED. What were the favors to which the Senator refers that Mr. Hopkins failed to return? What was the character of them?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Nothing except the warm, hearty, and earnest support they had given him in his candidacy for the senatorship.

Mr. REED. Support for what?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. His candidacy before the primaries.

Mr. REED. No; I mean what support was he to give them—for what office?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gov. Yates expected that Senator Hopkins would give him his support for the governorship, and I presume Gov. Deneen also expected the same evidence of friendship on the part of Senator Hopkins; but neither of them got it.

Mr. REED. Was not Gov. Deneen elected that year?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He was elected that year.

Mr. LODGE. The support expected was for the nomination?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The support expected was for the nomination at the primaries. I am speaking about the primary election now.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I only wanted a little clearer statement.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is evident from the testimony that both the candidates for the governorship that year were not, after the election was over, in a pleasant frame of mind toward Senator Hopkins.

A STARTLING SITUATION IN WHICH GOV. DENEEN FINDS HIMSELF.

When the general election of 1908 had been held and the results known, it was found that President Taft had carried the State of Illinois by a majority of 179,000, while Gov. Deneen had carried it by a majority of only 23,000—179,000 as against 23,000! The situation was further complicated by the fact that our former Vice President, Mr. Stevenson, who that year was the Democratic candidate for governor of Illinois, gave notice that he would institute proceedings to contest the election of Gov. Deneen, founded upon the ground of alleged frauds in the election; so that when the legislature assembled on the 6th day of January, 1909, Gov. Deneen faced not simply the possibility or probability but the absolute certainty of a contest before that body.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Did Gov. Yates and Mr. LORIMER admit that after Deneen had carried the primaries and secured the nomination they practically bolted and opposed him at the general election so that on that account he ran far behind President Taft?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not recall any evidence in which he admitted that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Neither of them admitted it?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; I recall no such evidence. There were insinuations of that kind.

ORGANIZATION OF THE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. President, it is clear from what I stated before the interruption, that it was absolutely necessary for his political preservation that Gov. Deneen should control the organization of the legislature of 1909, before which this gubernatorial contest would come. In the preceding legislature he and Speaker Shurtleff had become opposed to each other, and the fact is undisputed that the governor felt very bitterly toward Speaker Shurtleff, and that his friends fully sympathized with his attitude in this respect. Before the legislature convened Gov. Deneen had inaugurated a movement to control the organization of the house. He had control of the senate, and to secure to the governor control of the house his friends held meetings in all parts of the State and multiplied candidates for the speakership as against Mr. Shurtleff. On the Monday evening preceding the organization of the legislature on Wednesday, January

6, 1909, the Deneen Republicans held a secret conference and agreed to support Representative King for speaker. The regular Republican caucus had been called for Tuesday, and having learned of the action taken on Monday night, Mr. Shurtleff was angry, undoubtedly angry, and refused to participate in that caucus.

THE GOVERNORSHIP CONTEST DETERMINED THE SPEAKERSHIP.

The Democrats were quick to see the opportunity they desired and equally quick to take advantage of it. Mr. Stevenson's contest for the governorship against Mr. Deneen was the one thing they had in mind, and to secure its success was the one purpose they had in their hearts. Gov. Deneen realized that if Shurtleff was speaker of the house he would have the power to appoint the committee to which would be submitted the question whether Mr. Stevenson or Gov. Deneen was entitled to that office, and the relations then existing between the latter and Mr. Shurtleff were such that he had no reason to expect any favors from him. To make the story brief, I may say that Gov. Deneen frankly admits in his testimony that this contest on his part was a fight for his political life.

As I have said, Mr. Shurtleff did not go into the Republican caucus, but he was a candidate for the speakership on the floor of the house. Eighty-five votes were cast—25 Republicans and 60 Democrats—for Mr. Shurtleff, and he was elected speaker of the house. Every Democratic member, with the exception of two, voted for him.

In his testimony Mr. Shurtleff says:

I think the gubernatorial contest overshadowed everything else.

All the witnesses are agreed, I think, in the opinion that Mr. Shurtleff's election as speaker had nothing to do with the pending senatorial election. At that time no person had been suggested for the Senatorship except those who had been before the primaries. Except as between them, no contest was anticipated. Even those who disliked Senator Hopkins had never dreamed that his election could be prevented except by the choice of one of the gentlemen who had participated in the primaries.

Gov. Deneen says he felt compelled to support Mr. Hopkins for the Senatorship because of the fact that he was the primary nominee, and he (Gov. Deneen) had been leader in the movement to secure the adoption of the primary system of nomination.

Senator LORIMER at that time and for a long time after had no thought that any contest could or would be made against Senator Hopkins. Seventeen members of the house who were cordial supporters of Senator Hopkins voted for Mr. Shurtleff, showing that the question of the Senatorship was not at all involved in the election of a speaker.

Mr. Hopkins testified that his personal friends, and some who had supported him to the end, voted for Mr. Shurtleff; that he regarded the question of the speakership as a controversy between Gov. Deneen and Mr. Shurtleff; that there was no general talk that the Senatorship was involved in the election of Shurtleff; and that none of his friends ever suggested to him the thought that such was the fact.

Speaker Shurtleff says:

I never heard it mentioned in any way whatever.

Many of the prominent Democratic members of the house testified to the same effect—that the election of Speaker Shurtleff was no part of such a plan and as such was never mention by anyone.

Thomas Tippit, leader of one faction of the Democrats in the house, testified: "There was no thought of it."

Representative De Wolf (Democrat) testified that he heard no intimation at the time the speaker was elected that the senatorial election was involved.

Mr. Espy (Democrat) testified that the election of speaker had no sort of reference or relation to the senatorial election.

Mr. Donahue, also a Democrat, testified quite at length upon that subject. The following extracts from his testimony clearly express his views:

Mr. HEALY. Did you have any understanding of any sort with reference to the election of Mr. Shurtleff which in any way affected the Democratic membership of that body?

Mr. DONAHUE. No. Mr. Shurtleff stood pretty well throughout the State as being a very fair speaker. He was very popular with the Democrats, and they thought he was the fairest speaker Illinois had had for many years. That was the general impression among the Democrats. It was discussed, and it was said that former speakers, be they Democrats or Republicans, would not recognize the minority at all in any legislation or in any way; but Mr. Shurtleff broke over that rule and gave every member a fair show to get measures through if he could. He did not recognize any politics in so far as general legislation was concerned. That was the feeling among the Democrats throughout the State. There was talk of a contest over the governorship, and the Democrats felt that if Shurtleff was speaker they would probably get a recount of the votes.

In this connection it must be remembered that at that time no Republican was a candidate for the senatorship except Messrs. Hopkins, Foss, Mason, and Webster—those who had been before the primaries. No other names had even been suggested.

Senator LORIMER was not in the city of Springfield between November, 1908, and January 12, 1909, a week after Mr. Shurtleff had been elected speaker. He was in Washington when Congress assembled. Went to his home in Chicago for the holidays, but did not go to Springfield until a week after the speaker had been elected. So far as the evidence in this case shows, his only connection with any movement for the organization of the house of representatives was during the Christmas recess, when he was at home. It appears that during such recess Messrs. Shurtleff and Shanahan, members-elect of the Illinois Legislature, called upon him in Chicago regarding the speakership. They told him that Gov. Deneen had suggested Col. Chiperfield, who was then a member of the governor's military staff, in connection with that position, and stated that Mr. Chiperfield had been twice to Chicago to confer with Mr. Shurtleff in regard to his proposed candidacy. Although Mr. Chiperfield had not been one of his political friends, Mr. LORIMER expressed the opinion that in the interest of party harmony the selection of Mr. Chiperfield for the speakership was a proper course to pursue, and that he would ask his friends to cooperate in securing his election; but as Gov. Deneen subsequently declined to support Mr. Chiperfield, nothing resulted from the conference.

The evidence does not disclose a fact, so far as I can remember, in any way connecting Mr. LORIMER with the organization of the house of representatives.

GOV. DENEEN'S EXTREMITY.

It will be understood, I think, by those who have followed me thus far that Gov. Deneen appreciated his helplessness as he faced the contest with Mr. Stevenson. He realized that unless he controlled the organization of the house in some form a committee might be appointed consisting of men who might oust him from the governorship. No one denies that such a danger stared him in the face. His anxiety was extreme. It was so great that through his political and personal friend and adviser, Roy O. West, he caused a meeting of the Republican State central committee to be called to devise means to induce the Republican members of the house of representatives to support the governor in an effort to have the appointment of the house commitees taken away from the speaker. The meeting of that committee was held in Springfield January 12, 1909, and adopted a resolution substantially to that effect, but the members did not back it up with their friends in the house, and it was always referred to as the "paper resolution," because it utterly failed to accomplish the result so ardently hoped for by the governor, and too late he discovered that he had been deserted by those upon whom he thought he had the best right to rely.

I can not conceive of any man elected as chief magistrate of a sovereign State, standing in a more helpless position than that in which Gov. Deneen found himself at that time. He had alienated friends with whom he had affiliated politically for many years in the past. He had alienated Mr. Shurtleff, who as speaker of the house had the power to appoint all committees. He had failed to secure, through the efforts of the State central committee, a modification of the rules of the house so as to take the appointment of committees from the speaker; and he stood alone, confronting a situation fraught with danger and threatening his political downfall.

What did he do? In his extremity he remembered his former friend WILLIAM LORIMER, and though they had not met for several years, he sent Roy O. West to Mr. LORIMER, who had just reached Springfield, to ask if he would object to an interview with him. Mr. LORIMER replied that he would not, and an interview was arranged. Neither one asserts that they had been politically estranged. Mr. LORIMER says that he always believed that Mr. Deneen liked him personally, and would be glad to affiliate with him politically, but had been won away from him by powerful influences. Mr. Deneen took pains to testify that a wrong impression had gone out as to his relations with Mr. LORIMER; that while separated politically they had not been unfriendly, but the fact remains that they had not been in conference and had had no common interests for five or six years.

AN EFFORT TO UNITE THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND SAVE THE GOVERNORSHIP.

On the 13th day of January, the very day following the meeting of the State central committee, the proposed interview was had between Gov. Deneen and Mr. LORIMER, beginning at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, in the governor's office, and extending until 9 o'clock, and then from 9 o'clock until midnight at the gubernatorial mansion. At that meeting, according to the testimony of Gov. Deneen, they discussed the waterway legislation, which was a paramount issue in Illinois. They discussed an anticipated decision nullifying the primary law. They discussed their previous political relations. They discussed political conditions generally. They discussed the senatorial situation. They discussed the organization of the house. Mr. LORIMER testified that they talked about the committee that would probably be appointed to investigate Gov. Deneen's title to the governorship, and the organization of the house only to that extent, showing that the discussion of this subject was the leading object in Gov. Deneen's mind when he sought this conference with Senator LORIMER.

The real purpose on Gov. Deneen's part was expressed by Mr. LORIMER when he says that Deneen seemed to be fearful that a committee might be appointed that would turn him out of office regardless of the evidence, and he felt that Speaker Shurtleff was so antagonistic to him that he would do anything to destroy him.

Senator FLETCHER inquired:

That was after Shurtleff had been elected speaker?

Senator LORIMER. That was after Shurtleff had been elected speaker. I never discussed the house organization with him prior to that time and no other committee except that one.

From Gov. Deneen's testimony it further appears, in answer to a question by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]:

Was the election of Shurtleff discussed by you and Senator LORIMER?

Mr. DENEEN. I do not recollect the details, but I suppose it was.

Senator KERN. You had been opposed to Shurtleff's election?

Mr. DENEEN. I had been opposed to it.

Senator KERN. And he had favored Shurtleff's election, as I understand?

Mr. DENEEN. He had favored it.

Senator KERN. Was there any discussion between you as to the reasons?

Mr. DENEEN. The discussion was regarding the elements of strength that I had relied upon and had not felt that I was supported as well as I had hoped and expected.

He admitted that those who had been supporting him had failed. He was looking for help. They were having a heart-to-heart talk.

Proceeding, Gov. Deneen says:

And he was pointing out the weaknesses of my position, and we were discussing it. It ran along and was a frank talk about conditions. I think my contest was discussed then only in a general way—no details at all. I discussed with him what would be the outcome of this coalition as it affected me, and particularly as to whether I would be ousted from office. That, I think, was mentioned at that time.

Senator KERN. Did he indicate to you that he would be opposed to your being ousted?

Mr. DENEEN. No; he did not give me his views on that subject, nor did I ask him his views. The point was to expedite the hearing and bring it to an end, and, if I was to be ousted, to have it occur at once and get rid of it, and not have it drag along indefinitely and to nobody's advantage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. REED. A few moments ago the Senator from Vermont, in discussing Shurtleff's election, said it was not regarded as in any manner inimical to the interests of Senator Hopkins. I understood the Senator to say that and to cite some evidence. I am not so familiar with this record as I had hoped to be, but in that connection it seems to me the man most interested and most likely to know would be Senator Hopkins, and I desire to call attention, with the Senator's kind permission, to the following from the abstract of the hearings, appearing at page 8597.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. What page does the Senator read from?

Mr. REED. Abstract of the record, page 8597.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri that I never have read that abstract.

Mr. REED. It appears in the record proper, as given by a reference here, at pages 312, 313, and 314, and I read the following, beginning on page 312, so that we may have the context:

I heard nothing during the six months of the deadlock about the proposed candidacy of Mr. LORIMER until just a couple of weeks before the close. I knew that LORIMER was there to defeat me, and my understanding was that he would use any instrument that he could to bring about my defeat.

Now, the reference to page 313 is as follows:

Shurtleff did not vote for me at all. He was actively against me.

Now to the point to which I am calling attention, page 314:

The election of Shurtleff could not be otherwise than hostile to my candidacy. I did not know that Shurtleff would be elected until the news was flashed from Washington. I regarded it as a blow to my candidacy. As I understand the election of Shurtleff, there was a deal in the legislature.

It seemed to me that when the Senator was quoting the evidence of others to the effect that the election of Shurtleff had no effect upon the senatorial contest, it would only be right that the Senate, at least, should know that in the opinion of the man most interested, Senator Hopkins, the election of Shurtleff did have a most detrimental effect upon his candidacy.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Senator Hopkins testified that at that time he had no thought of it, that his friends had no thought of any such thing; and that to which reference is now made was entirely an afterthought, judged only by the result. Senator Hopkins in his testimony makes this perfectly clear.

Probably no man was ever more bitterly opposed than was Senator Hopkins by the Democrats of that body. Everyone appearing before the committee testified to the extreme dislike of the Democrats for Senator Hopkins, for the reason that when he was upon the stump in Illinois he used terms in reference to them which cut them to the quick. In other words, as they expressed it, he was harsh and severe in his denunciation of Democracy and of Democrats. It can not be denied that the entire Democratic body entertained toward Senator Hopkins a feeling of hostility not entertained toward any other person in the State of Illinois.

I will demonstrate as I go along that this desire to defeat him was a matter of growth. I have already indicated that he had alienated the sympathy of Yates and of LORIMER and of Deneen and of others, and that the delay which came later, and which I ask the Senator from Missouri to note when I reach it, gave the opportunity for all these forces to unite to defeat Senator Hopkins. It was this delay, not the election of the speaker by Democratic votes, that resulted in his downfall.

Resuming the discussion and coming back to Gov. Deneen's testimony, in answer to the question of Senator KERN:

Did he indicate to you that he would be opposed to your being ousted?

Mr. DENEEN. No; he did not give me his views on that subject, nor did I ask him his views. The point was to expedite the hearing and bring it to an end, and if I was to be ousted, to have it occur at once and get rid of it, and not have it drag along indefinitely and to nobody's advantage.

Senator KERN. In the course of that five hours' conversation, did he indicate any feeling on his part as to whether he wanted you to be governor of Illinois or wanted to have Stevenson governor?

Mr. DENEEN. No; I did not ask him about that. His conversation was friendly, but we did not discuss that more than that. We did not go into the details. Then we went on to another matter that was of importance to us; that I will state.

Senator KENYON. Before you leave that subject, did you consider Mr. LORIMER a party who would be influential in determining whether or not you would be ousted from office?

Mr. DENEEN. I assumed that he and Mr. Shurtleff would finally settle it.

The result of that meeting, which lasted five hours, was, as Mr. LORIMER expresses it, that there was a sort of semifriendly relationship established, and it was understood that they would meet each other and discuss political affairs in the future.

About that time it appears from the evidence that Gov. Deneen had become very much disappointed in Mr. Hopkins. A meeting was held the next week between Gov. Deneen and Mr. LORIMER, and the governor testifies that that meeting and the next one and all subsequent meetings between them were either by appointment or agreement or suggestion between himself and Senator LORIMER. He is asked the question:

Mr. HANECY. And they were all friendly conferences?

Mr. DENEEN. All of them.

Mr. HANECY. You were considerably annoyed, after the meeting of the State central committee on the 12th, at Senator Hopkins and his friends, for the position they took in that meeting toward you and your measures, were you not?

Mr. DENEEN. Considerably disappointed.

Mr. HANECY. You were more than that, were you not?

Mr. DENEEN. Well, I was disappointed very much. I do not know about being annoyed about it.

On the 18th of January another meeting between the governor and Mr. LORIMER was held, after which the latter returned to Washington.

GOV. DENEEN RESPONSIBLE FOR OBSTRUCTING ELECTION OF SENATOR.

At that time Gov. Deneen determined upon a course of action which changed existing conditions and ultimately resulted in the defeat of Senator Hopkins. He assumed the entire responsibility of preventing or "postponing," as he called it, the election of Senator Hopkins until the question of his own title to the governorship was determined; and, as a matter of fact, that "postponement" extended from January 18 to March 18, a period of two months, during which time all the elements against Hopkins became united and made his election impossible.

January 19 the vote for Senator was taken in the separate Houses, and 15 of Gov. Deneen's political adherents—Republicans—refrained from voting for Mr. Hopkins. The result was no choice. On January 20 the first joint vote in the general assembly was taken, and 13 of Gov. Deneen's adherents withheld their votes from Senator Hopkins, preventing his election on that day. There is no disguising the fact——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. How many Lorimer Republicans withheld their votes?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not remember. I will ask the Senator how many?

Mr. KERN. You have the record here.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not the record. I have an extract from the record.

Mr. KERN. There were more, I will say, of the so-called Lorimer Republicans than there were of the Deneen Republicans who refrained from voting.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not recall that fact. I will not dispute the Senator.

Mr. KERN. But why should the Senator emphasize the fact that certain friends of Gov. Deneen failed to vote for Mr. Hopkins without referring to the fact that other Republican senators and members of the house also refrained from voting for him?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will tell the Senator. I will quote from Mr. Deneen's testimony. It will be found on page 1141, if anyone cares to look at it, where he assumes the responsibility for that action. That election, as he calls it, was "postponed" from January 19 to March 18, a period of two months, that his title to the governorship might be tried and established. His testimony is as follows:

Mr. HEALY. Is it true that at any time during the senatorial deadlock you retarded or attempt to retard in any way the election of Senator Hopkins?

Mr. DENEEN. My friends and I postponed the election of Senator Hopkins, or some of them did, rather, until my matter was settled in reference to the contest on March 17 or 18. A number of my friends felt that Senator Hopkins's friends intended to join and put me out of office, not with his approval, and, I think, against his judgment, and it would have been against his advice if consulted. They felt he would have no influence with those men and that they intended to join and put me out.

Further on in his testimony he says:

Some of the more active men felt that the senatorial matter should not be settled until the gubernatorial matter was settled. They were interested in a lot of legislation, and they felt the matters should be settled together, and I think some of them remained out for that reason.

It can not be denied, as I was about to say when interrupted, that Gov. Deneen and his friends were responsible for preventing the election of Senator Hopkins during that long period of two months.

On January 27 another of these friendly conferences between Gov. Deneen and Mr. LORIMER occurred extending from 10 o'clock at night until morning, in which they became friends and reestablished old relations. Mr. LORIMER said:

I thought Gov. Deneen was trying to establish friendly relations with the men I was associated with in Illinois, and I am sure that was my disposition.

At that time they agreed to work together for fair primaries; they discussed the situation in Chicago, where they feared the influence of Mayor Busse and the police force. They discussed the influence of the 7,000 saloons in Chicago; also the mayor's use of the police force of that city, and took into consideration the fact that 40 per cent of the Republican vote of the State was in Cook County; and coming to the question of the senatorship, Mr. Deneen said that if Hopkins should be reelected whatever power and influence went with the office would go to Busse and Campbell and that element of the party in Cook County, and he complained again because the Senator had not rendered him such assistance as he felt he should have rendered; and he said it would be for the best interests of the party that Mr. Hopkins should not be reelected and that he would not help him.

It was also at this meeting that Gov. Deneen complained to Mr. LORIMER of the harsh treatment of Senator Hopkins in not giving him his support, and particularly the lack of support on the part of Mr. Hopkins's friends at the State committee meeting, over the results of which he felt so much chagrin. Gov. Deneen evidently realized the embarrassing situation to which his mistakes had brought him, and he was frank in his acknowledgment.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. Was there harmony between Gov. Deneen and Senator LORIMER in their testimony as to the events of that evening?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think so. I do not understand that they disagreed.

Mr. KERN. Did Gov. Deneen testify to the fact?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He testified to all these meetings. Does the Senator understand that he denied that statement?

Mr. KERN. No; I am asking the Senator from whom he is quoting.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was quoting this from Senator LORIMER's testimony.

Mr. KERN. I understood the Senator to state certain facts and then to draw certain conclusions therefrom. I ask him whether he quotes those facts from the testimony of Senator LORIMER or the testimony of Gov. Deneen.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I quoted those from the testimony of Senator LORIMER, but I do not understand that they were ever denied. Senator LORIMER said:

At the interview, when he told me positively that he, Gov. Deneen, would try to defeat Senator Hopkins, I then urged him to become a candidate.

Mr. HANECY. You urged Gov. Deneen?

Senator LORIMER. Yes. That was the latter part of January.

Mr. HANECY. What did Gov. Deneen say to your suggestion in that respect?

Senator LORIMER. At the first interview he rather indicated, I thought, that he would like to think about the matter. He did not encourage it.

Mr. HANECY. Did he repel it?

Senator LORIMER. No; I think not.

Mr. REED. I do not like to interrupt the Senator, but may I ask what was the date of the meeting Senator LORIMER was testifying to?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. January 27, as I remember it.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator recall that that is directly in the teeth of Senator Hopkins's testimony that Senator LORIMER at Willard's Hotel long before that had given him to understand that he was against him?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly; and I will tell you that circumstance. There is no question about it. Senator LORIMER, after the election of 1908, knew and felt that Senator Hopkins had not supported Gov. Yates, and he resented it. Mr. LORIMER had no expectation of opposing him for it, but when Senator Hopkins sought an interview with him he declined to grant one, and when, afterwards, Senator Hopkins met him here in Washington at the Willard Hotel and attempted to discuss with him what action he would take when the legislature met, Senator LORIMER told him it would not do any good to discuss the matter.

Senator LORIMER testifies that he would have been glad to see Mr. Hopkins defeated, but he had no expectation that any means could be adopted to defeat him, and it did not occur to him until after these interviews with Gov. Deneen that such a thing as that would be possible. That explains the matter about which the Senator inquired.

Mr. REED. I caught it perhaps wrongly. I would not misquote the Senator, but the impression I got from the Senator's remarks was that Senator LORIMER had testified that he had not been in opposition to Senator Hopkins.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think that I said anything of the kind. I said in the very beginning that Senator Hopkins had gained the distrust or the ill will both of Yates and LORIMER, and in addition, that of Gov. Deneen, because his attitude in the primary election had been such as to disappoint all of them, but not that they had come to the point of deciding to oppose his election. They did not like his action——

Mr. REED. I think that was away in the past.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; that was in November.

Mr. REED. I may have misunderstood the Senator, and I rose to try to get myself right in this matter. I understood the Senator to state, in effect, that Senator LORIMER had not opposed Senator Hopkins in the early part of his contest for the Senatorship before the legislature, and I wanted to ask the Senator if it was not true that Senator Hopkins had testified to a meeting at the Willard Hotel prior to the election actually coming on in which Senator LORIMER had told Senator Hopkins that he was opposed to him.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I thought I just told the Senator that Mr. LORIMER told Senator Hopkins that he was opposed to him, and there was no use talking about it.

Mr. REED. I may have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I want to remind the Senator that Senator LORIMER testified that even then and for a long time after he had no intention of taking any steps to oppose Mr. Hopkins's election, because he did not suppose it would be possible to defeat him, but in his heart he did not like him and would have been glad to have had some other person elected Senator. I do not think there is any misunderstanding as to Senator LORIMER's position on that point.

Resuming, let me say that good relations between Gov. Deneen and Mr. LORIMER followed that meeting of January 27.

HARMONY RESTORED BETWEEN GOV. DENEEN AND SPEAKER SHURTLEFF.

One of the results which followed is shown in the testimony of Mr. Shurtleff, where he speaks of the committee that was appointed to consider questions involved in the contest between Mr. Stevenson and Gov. Deneen for the governorship. He says:

The committee was appointed upon the 11th day of February—a majority of Republicans—and every Republican appointed by me was a Deneen man, thoroughly a Deneen man. One of Gov. Deneen's close friends, Edward J. King, candidate for speaker, was on the committee; Mr. Reynolds, of Rockford, was chairman of the committee. He was one of their candidates for speaker. I appointed no Republican upon that committee who had any affiliations with any of our friends or who had any affiliations except the closest with Gov. Deneen, which practically settled the contest on February 11.

Mr. REED. That seems to be a very frank admission that they packed the jury.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Senator Jones asked this question:

So, if you packed any committee, you packed that committee in behalf of Gov. Deneen?

Mr. SHURTLEFF. I did.

I do not think there is any dispute between the Senator and myself on that point.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. While we may differ as to what was in the mind of these men, does not the Senator admit that the speaker of the house elected at the time of its organization was hostile to the candidate for the United States Senate who had carried the primaries, and was also hostile to the governor who had been chosen at the election in November?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will have to divide that question in answering it. I do not understand that he was opposed to Senator Hopkins. I do not remember what his attitude was.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is not anything in the record to indicate that Senator Hopkins, the party nominee, had his wish followed in choosing a presiding officer for the house, is there?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. There was no contest about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the speaker who was selected was a loyal and intimate friend of Senator LORIMER.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He was; there is no question about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So that, whether it was designedly brought about or not, the fact remains that the nominee for the Senate, Mr. Hopkins, failed to secure a loyal friend as presiding officer, and Senator LORIMER did secure in that office a personal, loyal friend. That is the fact, is it not?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have no doubt that is the fact; but it was not claimed at that time, nor for months after, that it had any reference to Senator LORIMER's candidacy, and as I proceed I will demonstrate that to the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, that is a matter for inference. Is it not also a fact that Gov. Deneen, who, as the Senator says, had his very official life at stake, a contest hanging over him, did not have his choice selected for speaker, and that Mr. LORIMER had his intimate friend in that position, so that they held the destiny of the governor-elect in their hands by securing the reorganization of the house?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was trying to demonstrate the fact——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator from Vermont differ from me in saying that that is the fact, no matter what was the motive of these men in bringing the situation about?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not undertake to say what Speaker Shurtleff's attitude was on the senatorial question when the legislature opened; I do not recall it. I have the record of the several roll calls in my hand, but it would take some time to examine them. I will do this, and call the Senator's attention to it later.

Mr. REED. May I interrupt the Senator for a further question?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes, for a question; but I do not want to be interrupted in my remarks too frequently because I have a long statement to make, and the question of physical endurance is one to be seriously considered in this weather.

Mr. REED. The question I am asking is in good faith and for light and not to provoke a controversy. The Senator stated that there was an antipathy between Gov. Deneen and Senator LORIMER.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I did not say that there was an antipathy between the governor and Senator LORIMER.

Mr. REED. Political antipathy?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; they had remained friends, but they had separated politically.

Mr. REED. Yes; a political antipathy.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I did not call it "antipathy."

Mr. REED. Well, whatever name the Senator calls it. He said there was a contest, and that was gotten out of the way, for Shurtleff, who had been bitterly opposed to the governor, appointed a committee solely of his friends. The Senator has simply stated what was the result. What were the considerations? How was that effected? How did it happen that Shurtleff, who had been bitterly opposed to Gov. Deneen, so bitterly that they expected him to pack the committee against the governor, after a conference with these gentlemen turned around and packed the committee for him? There must have been a reason for it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator has patience and will allow me to proceed, I will tell him. I can not stop to explain in advance that which I intend to discuss later on.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LORIMER. To answer the question as to whether or not Speaker Shurtleff ever voted for Senator Hopkins, I will say that the record will show that Speaker Shurtleff testified that Senator Hopkins's friends called on him and asked him to make a statement in writing, which he did, that whoever received the majority of the vote in his senatorial district he would vote for. At that time Senator Hopkins naturally supposed that he would receive a large majority in that district, because that district had been in the congressional district that he represented in Congress for a great many years. Congressman Foss received about two votes to one over Senator Hopkins, and Speaker Shurtleff voted for Mr. Foss, and continued to vote for him from the first ballot until the last ballot, except the time when he voted for me and when he once voted for Gov. Deneen. That is the record.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I find from examining the record that down to the fifty-seventh ballot he voted for Mr. Foss.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That would indicate that naturally he would not be the choice of Mr. Hopkins as the speaker of the house of representatives, would it not?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Coming back to the matter I was discussing when interrupted, Senator LORIMER testified that Gov. Deneen also stated that he would try to defeat Hopkins, and in that connection asked Mr. LORIMER to suggest to Speaker Shurtleff that in the appointment of a committee to visit the charitable institutions of the State he should select only Hopkins men. Their duties as members of such committee would take them away from Springfield for a couple of weeks, tiding over the period of the vote on the senatorship. Mr. LORIMER assumed that this was done, as he conveyed the governor's suggestion to the speaker, who called upon the governor the following day to discuss it.

Concerning their relations afterwards, Senator LORIMER says:

I think I talked with him [Gov. Deneen] every week from that time on until the last week or the second last week of the session of the general assembly; some weeks one interview.

GOVERNERSHIP CONTEST SETTLED.

On March 18, which was two months after the organization of the house, the title to the governorship was settled. In the meantime there had been created a union of forces against Mr. Hopkins. In February there occurred general discussions as to the advisability of bringing forward a compromise candidate. There is no question but that at that time Gov. Deneen, Senator LORIMER, and many others were of the opinion that the contest would result in the election of some person other than those who up to that time had received the votes of the general assembly. In February, after they had discussed the possible candidacy of Gov. Deneen, the latter suggested that they cooperate in putting the election of Senator over until after the 4th of March, when the seat would become vacant and the people insistent that it be filled, thereby creating a condition under which Gov. Deneen could consistently accept the place.

About March 15 Gov. Deneen told Mr. LORIMER that it would be embarrassing to him personally to make arrangements to become a candidate for the Senate, and the latter suggested that he have his friend, Roy O. West, come to Springfield the following week, and that he [LORIMER] would discuss the plan with him. This was done, and plans were made between LORIMER and West to bring about the election of Gov. Deneen, it being agreed that his name would be presented to the legislature on March 24, but on the evening of March 23 Mr. West informed Mr. LORIMER that the governor would not be a candidate.

If Senators will read the testimony of Mr. Alschuler, brother of a former candidate for governor of that State on the Democratic ticket, a man who went to that legislature from Senator Hopkins's home town and home county, elected as a Democrat, and whose sole mission in that body was to defeat Senator

Hopkins's reelection, and who apparently thought of nothing else from the opening of the session to the day of the election——

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Let me finish my sentence. Senators will find that Mr. Alschuler testified that it was expected that Gov. Deneen's name would come before the legislature, and that he immediately saw all the Democrats he could and asked them to support the governor.

Mr. KERN. Did I understand the Senator to say that Alschuler had been the Democratic candidate for governor?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No. I said his brother—I will ask the Senator to correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. KERN. He had a brother who was a candidate for governor, but in his testimony he expressly exonerated his brother from any complicity in his conduct or in anything he said.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Exactly. I quite agree with the Senator as to that; Mr. Alschuler has been a member of a subsequent legislature, and is now the Democratic leader of that body.

Mr. KERN. He measured swords with Lee O'Neil Browne.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He testified that on that occasion the Democrats were ready to throw their strength to Mr. Deneen, if his name had been presented. Senator LORIMER testified that Gov. Deneen said that opposition developed against his candidacy, because his election would make Mr. Oglesby, then the lieutenant governor, governor of the State, and that for some reason or other, not necessary to examine at this time, his elevation to that office would not be agreeable to Mr. Deneen's friends.

As time ran on they attempted to agree upon Mr. Shurtleff as a candidate for the Senate. Mr. LORIMER says in his testimony, speaking of an interview with Gov. Deneen:

I suggested the name of Speaker Shurtleff. We talked about him for quite a while, and that night he said that he thought I ought to become a candidate.

I talked for Shurtleff, and he said he would let me know in about a week; that he would have a talk with his friends in Chicago about that. We had a conference every week for, I think, a period of time running over about three weeks. Finally he told me he had talked with his newspaper friends in Chicago, and named Mr. Noyes, the editor of the Record-Herald, and they were opposed to Mr. Shurtleff's election, and he said: "Why, I can not support him, because I can not afford to break with my friends on account of it."

Gov. Deneen says in his testimony in relation to this matter:

He [LORIMER] suggested Mr. Shurtleff, and I discussed that with him. The point of the thing was this: The discussion was of considerable length. I stated to him that I thought it would be a great misfortune for him, from his standpoint or that of his organization, to elect Mr. Shurtleff, because Mr. Shurtleff did not represent any forces in his organization.

He was a man of very considerable ability and experience, and individually was a very strong man, but he had not any large force back of him. I said he had not any great influence back of him, and that he would not add to it, and it would be a misfortune, I thought, to elect him from his standpoint. He urged it and said that he thought he could be elected; that he had the strength that came from organization there; the Democrats had voted for him there, and they could afford to vote for him as senator, because they had voted for him for speaker, and he argued the matter. I then said to him, "Well, if you have the power to elect Mr. Shurtleff, why do you not elect yourself? You are a power and he is not a power in Illinois politics, except as an individual factor, a man of ability."

Now comes the reason why Mr. LORIMER would not be a candidate when urged by Gov. Deenen, with the assertion that he was a power in the State and could be elected:

He stated that he could not afford to take it, because he had advanced in the House to such a position that he thought he had considerable influence in reference to waterway legislation, and it would take some time to acquire that influence in the Senate, and that the question was ripe for action and he could do more service in the House than in the Senate, as I recall it; and he dismissed it and the subject and went to other matters.

There is the testimony of Gov. Deneen as to the attitude of Mr. LORIMER at that time.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. I think it is fair that the Senate should understand whether the Senator is attempting or pretending to quote from the testimony in the record or whether he is giving his own digest and some of his own conclusions. I am unable to find——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. This is a quotation from the testimony of Gov. Deneen, pages 1123 and 1124 of the record.

Mr. REED. From the abstract?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; I do not refer to the abstract; no one does that; refer to the record.

CONDITION OF SENATORIAL DEADLOCK AT END OF THREE MONTHS.

We come along in this story to the middle of April, three months after the beginning of the deadlock. During this time Mr. LORIMER never had been a candidate, but had consistently and positively refused to be a candidate. At different times he had urged upon Gov. Deneen the possibility of Mr. Boutell's election. The testimony shows that Mr. Boutell had an interview with the President and went to Chicago to consult with his friends, in the hope that the factions might agree upon him; but he found that was not possible and his candidacy was abandoned. Mr. Lowden was suggested, also Congressman MCKINLEY, Congressman RODENBERG, A. C. Bartlett, Mr. Calhoun, and possibly others; but Mr. LORIMER testifies that Gov. Deneen found some reason for opposing all who had been mentioned. Roy O. West was anxious to become a candidate and had requested the governor to intercede for him; but in that case Mr. LORIMER was the objector, as he was not favorable to Mr. West's candidacy.

ALL WILLING TO SUPPORT DENEEN.

The committee finds as follows:

These general conditions continued for some considerable time; the situation was discussed in the newspapers and it seemed that no one among those mentioned was developing any strength; several State senators, some of whom were friendly to both Mr. LORIMER and Gov. Deneen, importuned Gov. Deneen to enter the race. And after the situation had been generally discussed for some time in the public press and otherwise, Mr. LORIMER again took up with the governor the question of his becoming a candidate, strongly urged him to enter the field, and assured him that he and his friends would support him. Gov. Deneen testified that the "Senator urged me very strongly to take it," stating that it was a position where "I must expect criticism," but that it was the only opportunity "I would ever have to go to the Senate, because if I did not the party would be organized on other theories and it would be impossible to overcome the difficulties."

Senator Curtis had presented the matter to Gov. Deneen and discussed it with him several times, urging as a reason the harmony which his candidacy would bring to the party, and that it would quiet the disturbances which had existed there for years. Mr. LORIMER also assured him that he would receive all but 15 of the Republican votes in the general assembly and most of the Democrats.

THE GOVERNOR'S ATTITUDE.

Gov. Deneen hesitated. He evidently wanted to become a candidate at that time. But he was the father of the primary law, and felt that it would not do for him to become a candidate against Senator Hopkins, who had been named in the primaries; and his reasons are shown in the testimony of Mr. Lundin, who was formerly a member of the State Senate of Illinois, and afterward a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States. I presume Senators know him. I will read what the committee finds from Mr. Lundin's testimony:

It appears from the testimony of Hon. Frederick Lundin, former member of the Illinois State Senate, and also of Congress, that he had frequent conferences with Gov. Deneen regarding the senatorial situation; that as late as the first week in May—that was nearly four months after the deadlock began—in a conference between them the governor thought it would be a good plan and good politics to make the deadlock secure and not elect a Senator at that time; that the object of the conference at that time was to get four or five Hopkins supporters to agree with others to vote for some one else; that the reason Gov. Deneen wanted this done was that he did not really know whether he wanted the Senatorship or not; that he would like it, but was not just sure that he dared take it; that while he wanted it, he supposed that the newspapers—the Record-Herald, Tribune, and Daily News—would not let him take it.

Mr. Lundin testified that during these conferences Gov. Deneen said that the men with whom he had worked in past years had not done right by him; that if Senator LORIMER's friends and his friends should work together, there would be no question but that they would be the controlling element in the Republican Party in the State; that he thought that Senator LORIMER could afford better than any other man to take the Senatorship; that it would injure him less, and, in fact, he said it might be a good solution of the deadlock to have Mr. LORIMER elected by Democratic votes.

WHY MR. LORIMER CONSENTED TO BECOME A CANDIDATE.

The deadlock, as I have said, had continued almost four months, and there was no immediate prospect of the election of anyone, and it was feared there would be adjournment of the legislature without the election of a Senator from that State. In that crisis it appears that Col. John R. Thompson, Col. Chauncey Dewey, and Col. Copley, all members of the governor's staff and his warm personal and political friends, men who were influential leaders in the Republican Party, became active in their efforts to induce Mr. LORIMER to become a candidate for the Senate. As the deadlock continued and it became apparent that Mr. LORIMER was probably the only person upon whom the different factions could unite, he finally determined to do so.

In addition to those last mentioned, he had the support of Gov. Yates and Speaker Shurtleff, who had been strongly urging him to accept Democratic votes and the election. Many other prominent Republicans were anxious to support him, and he also developed strength among the Democratic members, but it was not until two or three weeks before the election, which occurred May 26, 1909, and it had become perfectly apparent that unless he did become a candidate the legislature would adjourn without an election, that Mr. LORIMER's candidacy began to be seriously considered, and he thinks it was about the 10th or 12th of May when he determined to ascertain whether he could be elected. This substantially accords with the testimony of Gov. Deneen; and, if my recollection serves me correctly, it was on May 14 that the Chicago Tribune first mentioned Mr. LORIMER's name in connection with that office as a candidate.

When Mr. LORIMER began to consider the suggestion that he become a candidate for the Senatorship he went to his friend Mr. Shurtleff and to others to advise with them regarding the propriety and advisability of doing so. Mr. Shurtleff testifies that after talking with Mr. LORIMER he conferred with Mr. Browne as to his attitude in the matter. Mr. LORIMER says he knew that Mr. Browne would support Mr. Shurtleff if he were to become a candidate, and Mr. Shurtleff testifies that Mr. Browne had in fact urged him to become a candidate, and had assured him of the Democratic support in that event. It is equally true that Mr. Browne did not at any time favor the election of Mr. Hopkins, but was earnestly opposed to his election.

In relation to that matter Mr. Shurtleff testifies as follows:

Mr. Browne had been to me two or three different times and proposed to have the Democrats vote for me for United States Senator. He said it was the chance of my life; that I could be United States Senator; that there were a large number of Democrats who would vote for me and wanted to vote for me. I think he came to me two or three different times, telling me that I was making the mistake of my life that I did not let the Democrats vote for me for United States Senator. When the Lorimer movement started it was generally understood that there were two forces that had to be in unison to elect anybody United States Senator outside of A. J. Hopkins. One of these forces was Gov. Deneen and the other was Mr. Browne. Possibly to some of my friends I had said something about Browne's offer to vote for me, and I think they had been very solicitous to have me be a candidate. The suggestion was made that I go to Mr. Browne and ask him to vote for Senator LORIMER, which I did.

There you have the first introduction of this subject to Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne, through Mr. Shurtleff.

Mr. MARBLE. What did Mr. Browne say to you when you asked him to vote for Senator LORIMER?

Mr. SHURTLEFF. Well, he discussed the thing. He said he had voted for me for speaker, and that the Democrats in the district had been very well satisfied with it; that is, there had been no trouble over that; and that he had thought they could vote for me for Senator, inasmuch as they had voted for me for speaker; but the question of Senator LORIMER was a different proposition. He would have to consider it. He wanted to talk with the men in his district.

Mr. MARBLE. He gave you no answer positively, then, at the time of the first conversation?

Mr. SHURTLEFF. He gave me no answer positively.

Mr. Browne's version of the interview with Mr. Shurtleff is as follows:

Mr. Shurtleff asked me what I thought of WILLIAM LORIMER as a candidate for the position of United States Senator, or asked me whether I could support him—I can not tell you which, but it was something in substance to that effect—and also how many of the Democrats of my crowd, or my faction, so called, I thought would support him. I said to him that I had never given the matter any thought or consideration, that I could not speak for anybody but myself, and that as far as I was concerned I would have to think it over before I could determine or would determine whether I would be willing to vote for him myself or not. As to the others, if I voted for him myself, or concluded to support him, I would have to talk with the members individually in order to ascertain or know anything relative to the matter. He asked me if I would do that, if I would think it over. I told him I would and would give him an answer relative to myself first.

I also said to him at that time, "Why do you not become a candidate yourself, Ed?" He said, "Well, I am not known at Washington at all. I would be a stranger. I would not have the acquaintance there which Senator LORIMER has, and especially if I was sent down there by virtue of any Democratic votes at all, being a stranger I would have no force there as a Senator. Besides, I do not believe I could get enough votes to elect me." I said, "Neither do I." That is the sum and substance of that conversation.

Mr. LORIMER's recollection is as follows:

Senator KERN. Have you any recollection as to what occurred between you and Mr. Browne at that first conference?

Senator LORIMER. No; I do not recall the language. I talked with him about the friends in Chicago that were supporters of Browne, and he knew they were supporters of his, and he knew how friendly they were to me—such men as Cermak, and Sullivan, and Werdell, and Griffin, and John Walsh, and George Hilton—men that I was very well acquainted with, and that were my friends, and had been for a great many years. He said he knew that what I was saying was correct, and finally agreed to support me.

Senator KERN. Did he ever make any inquiry as to whether Roger Sullivan would support you or not?

Senator LORIMER. Yes; since you mention that, Senator, he did. He said this to me: "Now, you and Sullivan are very close personal friends," as we are. Our families are very friendly, and his boy and my boys went to Andover together. The only sport that I follow is sailing, and his boy was a sailor, and had a boat, and my boys always have had boats, and we follow the regattas and we were very intimate, and that was known to everybody. He said, in substance, that there was not room enough for Roger Sullivan and him and that I could not be his friend and Sullivan's friend, too. He said: "I am not going to help a man, even though my friends are anxious to have me help him, and put him into a place where he will have power, and then have that power used for the benefit of my enemy and to destroy me." I said to him that Mr. Sullivan had not indicated that he was going to support me, and I did not think he would help me, and I said: "You can depend upon it that if I am elected Senator, while I will not be unfriendly to Mr. Sullivan on account of your support, I will never do anything that will injure you. I will never do for Mr. Sullivan things through which he can injure you." After considerable talk along that line he said—he is a rather impulsive man: "Well, LORIMER, I will take your word for it, and I will support you;" and that ended the discussion between him and me about Mr. Sullivan.

Senator KERN. He being the Democratic leader, you recognized the importance of having his support?

Senator LORIMER. I recognized the importance of having his support, whether he was the Democrat leader or not, because there is no more influential man in the House of Representatives of Illinois than Mr. Browne; and I really thought he had more influence in the house before he was leader than he had at the time he was leader; I am sure he did.

Senator KERN. His followers, or the men that belonged to his faction, would be inclined to follow him, would they not?

Senator LORIMER. I can not answer as to that. I know that the men that belonged to his faction that were friends of mine would vote for me, if I was a candidate, whether Lee O'Neil Browne was for me or not. I know that from what they have said to me.

Senator KERN. You think you had more influence with them than he had?

Senator LORIMER. No; I think this way about it: If it was a question of their supporting Browne or me, if they had to choose between the two of us, some of them would have voted for Browne and some of them would have voted for me. I am quite sure Emanuel Abrahams would have voted for me as against Browne or anybody else, unless it was a condition of this sort, where, as a Democrat, he was candidate for United States Senator or some office of that kind and Emanuel Abrahams's vote would elect him as a Democrat. In such a case Abrahams would vote for him; but on questions that are not political Abrahams was more friendly to me than he was to Browne. There is not any doubt about that.

On this point Lee O'Neil Browne testified as follows:

I made up my mind to vote for him, providing there would be enough votes, combined Republican and Democratic, to elect him.

I cite this testimony because it appears in evidence that Mr. LORIMER had insisted he would not allow his name to go before the General Assembly of Illinois until assured that he would be elected without a contest. Mr. Browne in his testimony gives his reasons for insisting on that condition. He says:

I made up my mind to vote for him, providing there would be enough votes, combined Republican and Democratic, to elect him; and I never for a moment considered the proposition of myself, a lone Democrat, voting for him, because no such contingency could arise or be possible.

Senator KENYON inquired:

When you made up your mind to vote for him, did you not at the same time make up your mind to get enough Democrats to vote for him so that you could elect him?

Mr. BROWNE. I made up my mind, Senator, to use whatever influence I had with my friends to legitimately influence them to vote for Senator LORIMER, provided it would not hurt them or injure them politically; and I can cite you one instance where I expressly advised one of my followers not to vote for Mr. LORIMER, and he did not do it, because he said it would hurt him at home. I said to him "If that is the case, don't you vote for him, and don't you let anybody persuade you."

Senator JONES. Who was that?

Mr. BROWNE. George Meyers.

Senator JONES. Do you know whether that is the Meyers who testified here?

Mr. BROWNE. That is the Meyers who has been here and testified; yes, sir.

Mr. Browne testified as to what Mr. Shurtleff advised in this regard. Mr. Marble asked him this question:

And what did Mr. Shurtleff say?

Mr. BROWNE. He agreed with me that the contingency that I placed in my answer was a perfectly reasonable one. He agreed to it and said that he would not think of starting a roll call under any other circumstances, and then he suggested that I ascertain how many of the Democrats of my faction would vote for Mr. LORIMER. I told him I would do so, and I suggested to him that I be informed at as early a day as possible about how many of the so-called Tippit faction would support Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. Browne and Mr. Tippit were leaders of the rival factions of the Democratic membership of the house during that entire session.

Mr. Browne testified that at the time he advised Speaker Shurtleff that he would support Mr. LORIMER for the senatorship he made "it a point of honor with both him and Mr. LORIMER that no roll call for Mr. LORIMER should be started until it was an absolutely assured fact that there were votes enough to elect him." Mr. Shurtleff gave this promise for himself, and Mr. Browne then told Mr. Shurtleff that he would exact the same promise from Mr. LORIMER, which he did at their first meeting thereafter, according to the testimony of Mr. Browne. Senator KENYON inquired: "Then when did you exact it from Mr. LORIMER?"

Mr. BROWNE. Just as soon as I had any conversation with him in regard to the matter, which was shortly after I saw Mr. Shurtleff—very shortly, because the conferences relative to that campaign commenced to take place in those rooms very shortly after my telling Mr. Shurtleff what I would do.

We are now at the point where the deadlock had continued for four months, and the legislature would soon adjourn without choosing a United States Senator unless a compromise candidate could be agreed upon.

LORIMER BECOMES A CANDIDATE.

I have examined all the evidence bearing upon political conditions affecting the election of a United States Senator, and down to the 10th or 12th of May, practically four months after the first ballot was taken, and within two weeks of his election,

I can find no instance in which Mr. LORIMER wavered in his refusal to become a candidate. It was not until it became perfectly evident to every observing person that the legislature would take an adjournment without the election of a United States Senator unless he would consent to become a compromise candidate, that he even considered the proposition. No one testified that he had been a candidate, or that he had indicated by word or action up to that point that he would become a candidate. On the contrary, it appears in the evidence over and over again that he had persistently refused to entertain any suggestion of the kind. But when the crisis was reached, and it appeared that Illinois would be represented by only one Senator, he faced a responsibility, and urged by gentlemen from every wing of the Republican Party, he instituted inquiries to ascertain the real situation. He absolutely refused to publicly announce his candidacy, or to permit his name to be presented to the legislature, until he could be assured that his election would follow without a contest. He never intended to go before that legislature as a candidate with any doubt about his election. He did not care enough about it. He had become potential in the House of Representatives in connection with the great project to connect the Lakes and the Gulf by a deep waterway, and was beginning to see the successful accomplishment of that gigantic undertaking to which he had devoted large sums of money and long years of hard work, and he doubted much whether in this body he would possess the same power and influence with which he was loath to part. At that time he understood and believed that Gov. Deneen was supporting him. He was acting under the advice of three members of the governor's military family. He was sending them and others to Gov. Deneen to inquire of him in relation to the matter, and while he had no personal assurance from Gov. Deneen that he was then supporting him, he had been strongly urged by the governor to enter the lists, and from interviews between his supporters and Gov. Deneen and because of the friendship that had been renewed between them during the conferences covering a period of four months, he was led to believe, and did fully believe, that Gov. Deneen would favor his election. He discovered nothing to the contrary until the Sunday night before the Wednesday upon which day the election occurred, when he heard in the city of Chicago that the governor was not for him; he returned at once to Springfield and in response to inquiries among his friends learned that such was the fact.

Now, what were the peculiar and controlling conditions existing at that time in and about the General Assembly of the State of Illinois? Mr. Hopkins had been defeated in the primaries in Cook County and also in his home county of Kane. George W. Alschuler, whom I have already mentioned, a resident of his home city, a Democrat, had been elected to the house, his avowed object in taking the election being to defeat the reelection of Mr. Hopkins to the United States Senate. He had exerted himself days and nights during the entire session to accomplish this purpose. Col. COPLEY, now a Member of Congress from Mr. Hopkins's district, a Republican, was opposed to him. All testified that they did not know a Democrat to whom Mr. Hopkins was not offensive politically. He had carried the primaries by a small plurality, but the testimony shows there was a strong impression existing that he did not intend to abide by the result of the primaries, had he then been defeated. Whether there was any foundation for that impression I do not know, but that was the talk in Springfield. At that time Gov. Deneen was actively opposing Mr. Hopkins, though not openly. Speaker Shurtleff was consistently supporting Mr. Foss and was known to be opposed to Mr. Hopkins. Gov. Yates was opposed to both Hopkins and Deneen.

The feeling of Gov. Yates toward Gov. Deneen had, as before stated, been extreme. When it came to his knowledge that Mr. LORIMER was conferring with Gov. Deneen, offering his support for the Senatorship, he was displeased, and he testifies that he wrote to Mr. LORIMER from Florida, between February 15 and April 8, saying in substance:

> I see by the papers that you and your friends have definitely determined to support Gov. Deneen for United States Senator.
> You and your friends may have it in your power to do this; but after you have done it, and it is all settled, I want you to do me the favor to call Mr. Deneen aside and tell him that you have one friend who says that he is a liar still, and I am the man.

All this indicates the disruption of Republican Party harmony which was evident everywhere.

The Democrats, as I have said, were the bitter opponents of Mr. Hopkins, and they knew they could not elect their candidate—Mr. Stringer. No one considered that a possibility.

I am coming to the question of Mr. Stringer's attitude and standing, as Democratic candidate for the United States Senate, before that legislature. It is an interesting subject, and I wish there were more Senators present in the Chamber to hear it discussed, because it will throw a flood of light on the situation as it existed when Mr. LORIMER consented to become a candidate.

Mr. President, I shall now take up the question of the conditions existing in the legislature of Illinois at the time Mr. LORIMER authorized a canvas to be made to ascertain his strength.

NO HOPE FOR THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE.

I have already called attention to the fact that the Democrats were bitter in their opposition to the reelection of Senator Hopkins. They knew that they could not elect the Democratic candidate designated by their primaries, Mr. Stringer, who is a high-minded, candid man and one of the fairest witnesses I have ever seen upon the stand. On the other hand they lived in fear lest there be brought about a union of forces which might result in Mr. Hopkins's election, and they were willing to do almost anything to prevent such a result. To that end they were willing to vote for some other Republican who might be elected. I suppose that they were governed by the same consideration that has controlled the opposition in many State legislatures under similar circumstances.

I recall the fact that when I was elected to this body for the first time after a sharp contest, more than one-half of the Democrats in the Vermont Legislature—having become convinced that they could not elect their own candidate—voted for me, because as between the two Republicans they preferred me. My colleague [Mr. PAGE] received every Democratic vote at his last election by the Vermont Legislature. My friend, a member of this committee, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], received, at his election, a large number of Republican votes, because they preferred him to some other Democrat as a Senator from that State. Such incidents are not unusual among the States of the Union.

REMARKABLE STATEMENT BY DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR SENATOR.

The conditions in the Illinois Legislature at that time were not only peculiar but most astonishing. Mr. Stringer, in his testimony, tells a sad story of his desertion by the members of his own party in that body. I think I never heard of a condition in political life more pathetic in its nature than that of Mr. Stringer as a candidate of the Democratic Party before the Illinois Legislature. In his testimony he reveals the hopelessness of his cause when he says:

> As I have said before, I was not in the confidence of any of those who were managing affairs at that time. I barely had an acquaintance with Mr. Shurtleff, and I had no conversation whatever with him. I do not think I talked with Mr. Browne more than three times during the entire contest, and those conversations were very brief.

This reference was to Mr. Browne, the Democratic leader of the house, and Mr. Stringer testified that during the entire contest he did not have more than three conversations with him.

Senator KERN asked:

> Why did you have no conversation with him?
>
> Mr. STRINGER. I did not think that Mr. Browne's theory of the Democratic position was the correct theory.
>
> Senator KERN. What was his theory?
>
> Mr. STRINGER. I judged that his notion was to cast the Democratic vote for some Republican with a view, as I understood it, of disrupting the Republican organization. I could not see, however, where the election of any Republican whoever he was, was going to disrupt the Republican organization, when they were in a deadlock from which they could not extricate themselves except by Democratic assistance.
>
> Senator KERN. Did you ever talk with him about that policy of his?
> Mr. STRINGER. No, sir; I never did, Senator. Mr. Browne did not confer with me at any time during the contest. While my relations with him had been friendly, yet I did not feel at liberty to talk with him.

Think of it, Mr. President, he, the primary candidate of the Democratic Party, and Mr. Browne the leader of that party in the house, yet Browne never conferred with him during the entire session, nor did he feel at liberty to seek conferences with Mr. Browne.

> Senator KERN. Why not?
> Mr. STRINGER. I did not feel that he was looking at the matter of policy as I looked at it.
>
> Senator JONES. You did not try to convert him to your theory?
>
> Mr. STRINGER. No; I did not, Senator, because Mr. Browne is a man of very positive convictions, and it he arrives at certain convictions it is almost useless to endeavor to argue a proposition with him.
>
> Senator JONES. You understood that he had reached definite conclusions in regard to that matter?
>
> Mr. STRINGER. I judged that he had; yes.
>
> Senator KERN. Before the election of Senator LORIMER?
> Mr. STRINGER. Yes.
>
> * * * * * * * *
> Senator GAMBLE. Do you think his views were well known to members of the legislature?

And what I am about to read shows that this was determined as a policy early in the session, early in the history of the deadlock.

Mr. STRINGER. I do not know as to that. I felt this way, Senator, that he was the leader of a large number of Democratic members, that they had a great deal of admiration for him and would do just about as he said. This demoralization in the vote took place along about the middle of February, in which they would give complimentary votes to one another.

Within a month, and it was nearer than that, as I shall show later on. Mr. Stringer says:

This demoralization in the vote took place along about the middle of February, in which they would give complimentary votes to one another and to various Democrats throughout the State, and it seemed to me that he was not desirous of keeping up the party organization. I felt that way about it. Consequently I did not feel at liberty to talk with him, and he did not come to me and talk with me or consult with me. Occasionally I would hear him on the floor suggest to different members: "We will give So-and-so a complimentary vote to-day." He would do that without any consultation with me; and, of course, not giving me his confidence, I did not feel at liberty to go to him.

Is it to be wondered at that he closed his headquarters, as he did, just about a month after that contest began? He had headquarters at the beginning—the candidate of the Democratic Party—yet within a month he closed such headquarters and never reopened them.

Mr. KERN. Did he not remain there until the very last, begging the Democrats to vote for him?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Three days in a week.

Mr. KERN. Begging them to stand in line?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; but he had no headquarters.

Mr. KERN. And pointing out certain conditions in Washington?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He lived 30 miles from Springfield. He held a government office by appointment of Gov. Deneen. His duties were in that city; he went there to attend to them, but he went home nights. He did go to the Democrats and beg them to vote for him, but he never had the hearty support of Lee O'Neil Browne nor any other Democratic leader. Even the representative of the Democratic national committee only went there once, as I remember. Am I right about that?

Mr. KERN. I do not know. He was there more than once; once to prevent reported sales of Democratic votes for Hopkins, and he told them to stand by the nominee.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not recall any other instance when he asked the Democrats to stand by the nominee.

Mr. KERN. He was there frequently during the session.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Again Mr. Stringer testifies:

I was making an uphill fight for about two months, and I was making a fight substantially all alone; and I was discouraged all along the line. Still, I felt that I could not afford to let go for my own sake, if for no other reason.

The CHAIRMAN. There seemed to your mind to be no cohesive power in the Democratic Party as represented in the legislature?

Mr. STRINGER. No. There is not very much cohesiveness in the Democratic Party in the State of Illinois, as a general proposition.

The situation was one which had been determined, as it seems, from the very beginning of the session. Mr. Stringer says:

I should say, Mr. Healy, that almost from the beginning there was more or less discussion of the question of Democrats going over and voting for some Republican. Personally, I was opposed to any sort of a bipartisan alliance, even looking to the election of a Republican speaker, and I do not know any particular time at which the matter was first brought up. It was discussed generally all during the session.

The truth is that the time had come, it was past the middle of May, when the members of that general assembly were consumed by a desire to go home. A great portion of them were farmers. They receive an annual salary for their services, so that a long session diminishes their revenue. Toward the end of the session it is probable that Mr. LORIMER would have had the support of the Democrats at any time when he would have consented to become a candidate for Senator. Probably the same is true of Mr. Shurtleff. The only question to be determined was whether Mr. LORIMER would receive enough Republican votes. Mr. Stringer discusses the situation in his testimony as follows. Senator GAMBLE makes this inquiry:

I mean the general result. It did not come as a surprise to you?

Mr. STRINGER. No; I could not say that it did. I expected Mr. LORIMER to be elected that week. In fact, I thought he would be elected on the 25th. It was current rumor that he would be elected on the morning of the 25th.

Senator GAMBLE. And that a sufficient number of Democrats would vote for him to "put him over"?

Mr. STRINGER. A sufficient number of Democrats and Republicans. The question still seemed to be whether or not there would be a sufficient number of Republicans. For four or five days it was substantially conceded that there would be about 53 Democrats.

There is the authority of the Democratic candidate that for four or five days it had been conceded that 53 Democrats would vote for him.

Senator GAMBLE. But the question was whether he would have a sufficient number of Republicans?

Mr. STRINGER. Whether he would have a sufficient number of Republicans.

Senator GAMBLE. With the 53 Democrats, to elect him?

Mr. STRINGER. Yes, sir.

Senator GAMBLE. That was the point. That is all.

Senator KENYON came in at that point with this inquiry:

You say it was conceded for four or five days before his election that he would have 53 Democrats?

Mr. STRINGER. That seemed to be the general understanding, Senator; yes.

Senator KENYON. It was not just sprung the day of the election, then?

Mr. STRINGER. Oh, no. I think I heard, four or five days before, that there would be in the neighborhood of 45 or 50 Democrats that would support Mr. LORIMER. I heard that frequently.

He was inquired of further, and in answer to Mr. Hanecy's questions testified as follows:

Mr. HANECY. And I think you said yesterday, and probably again this morning, that it was understood about 10 days or 2 weeks before Mr. LORIMER was elected United States Senator that he could be elected at any time by Democratic votes?

Mr. STRINGER. Yes; that was the general understanding.

Mr. HANECY. And there was no secret about that at all, was there, at any time within two weeks or so before his election?

Mr. STRINGER. Oh, I think it was the general understanding that Mr. LORIMER could possibly get enough Democratic votes to elect him.

And he adds:

I think everybody was expecting it.

I think that a proper understanding of the actual conditions thus described by Mr. Stringer as existing in that body would warrant such a conclusion.

WHAT THE ROLL CALLS DISCLOSE.

How about Mr. Stringer's vote in the general assembly? Bear the fact in mind that during all the time that Mr. Stringer was before that body as the candidate of the people of Illinois of the Democratic faith he never had the serious consideration of his party in that general assembly. On January 20, the first day of the joint session of the two bodies of that legislature, two Democrats dropped away from him on the fifth roll call. On January 21, the second day the joint assembly voted, 20 Democrats dropped away from him.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. Is it not true that that was in spite of the fact that during the primary Mr. Stringer had carried every precinct in the State of Illinois and had been unanimously indorsed for the nomination by the Democratic State convention?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think so. He was the candidate of the Democratic Party.

Mr. KERN. How do you account, then, for the faithlessness of those men so early in the session?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not account for it. I account simply for the fact which existed in that legislature at that time, at a time when everybody supposed that Mr. Hopkins was going to be elected Senator.

On the 27th, the third day, 16 Democrats went wandering, not loyal to the candidate of the party in that body.

At the end of three weeks—on February 10—Mr. Stringer had only 53 votes of his party, and 23 had been cast for some other person. Take the period from February 10 to March 10—a full month—and his average vote was 41, with 35 wanderers. In the meantime, as I have already said, Mr. Stringer had become discouraged, had closed his headquarters, had taken his keeper away, and went home nights, 30 miles away, only returning to attend to his official duties, and, as my friend from Indiana has suggested, occasionally to beg some Democrat to vote for him.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. KERN. I submit to the Senator from Vermont that it is hardly a fair statement that Mr. Stringer occasionally begged some Democrat to vote for him.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall be very glad to be corrected by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. I understand his testimony to be that at the end of the session, while he had closed his headquarters, he was there pointing out conditions at Washington and begging Democrats to remain true to him, and he gave his reasons why he did that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I accept the Senator's statement. Perhaps I ought not to have said "occasionally." He was there on certain days of the week. I do not think he was there every day, because he went home nights, 30 miles away. But he was standing there as a candidate and claiming that he ought to have the support of the party. He admitted that he did plead and that he did argue with individual members of his party, but that, nevertheless, the party never did stand by him through that lengthy period. And yet there is not a word of evidence that, up to that time and down to May 10 or 12, Mr. LORIMER had ever been mentioned, with his consent, as a candidate for the senatorship.

What were the conditions in the legislature when Mr. LORIMER determined to become a candidate? I think that the forty-ninth vote was taken on March 24. On that day Mr. Stringer had 23 votes, and 45 votes were cast for Mr. A. J. Graham, another Democrat. These were some of the many complimentary votes to which Mr. Stringer referred. On the fifty-third ballot Mr. Stringer received 26 votes, and 41 votes were cast for Mr. McGoorty. On the fifty-second ballot he received 22 votes, and 43 votes were cast for H. E. Shaw, another Democrat. On the fifty-fourth ballot Mr. Stringer received 27 votes, and 40 Democratic votes went to E. J. Rainey. On the fifty-sixth ballot he received 23 votes, and there were 35 votes cast for J. J. Mitchell. On the fifty-eighth ballot Mr. Stringer received 28 votes, and 32 votes were cast for J. M. Dailey.

Coming down to March 25—the sixty-first ballot, midway of the period of the deadlock—Mr. Stringer received on that sixty-first ballot 15 votes, while 49 votes were cast for J. T. Murray. On April 8, on the sixty-eighth ballot, he received 21 votes, and 37 votes were cast for P. J. Lucey. On the seventy-sixth ballot, April 27, Mr. Stringer received 21 votes, and 47 votes were cast for William Loefler. On the eighty-second ballot, on May 6, about a week before Mr. LORIMER concluded to ascertain the situation, Mr. Stringer received 17 votes, and 42 Democratic votes went to George A. Cook.

These figures are eloquent of the fact that the Democratic Party in that general assembly was in just the condition described by Mr. Stringer. There was no hope whatever of his election, and those who should have supported him were idly frittering away their strength casting complimentary votes, and simply waiting for a time when a union could be made which would result in the election of some Republican who was less objectionable to them than Senator Hopkins.

Under the conditions which I have last described, Mr. President, on the 12th of May, or about that time, Mr. LORIMER, as he says, reluctantly consented to become a candidate, provided that enough votes could be brought to light to satisfy him that he could be elected without a contest. He and his friends began to look around to ascertain if that could be done. The testimony of Mr. Shurtleff, of Mr. Browne, of Mr. LORIMER, and of others is that they were inquiring of the different members of the legislature in both houses to learn what could be done; that they met in the speaker's room evenings; that Mr. Browne was there; that Mr. LORIMER came in; that the speaker was there—there is no question about that—and that reports were made about how men stood. Eventually, on the 26th of May, Mr. LORIMER was elected, as everybody knows.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. KERN. If it be true that there were this number of Democrats who were willing to vote for Mr. LORIMER all the time—that is, during the last two or three weeks—why was it necessary for Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne t pursue the activities testified to by him? Why should he do that if the Democrats were for LORIMER? Browne testified that he went out; that they held meetings, a dozen conferences in a night, going out to ascertain how certain Democrats were, and coming back and reporting; going backward and forward night after night. My question is, If the Democrats were already for LORIMER before that time, why were those activities of Lee O'Neil Browne necessary at all?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I was speaking of the general condition existing among the Democrats in that legislature before their attention was directed to Mr. LORIMER, for it had not been directed to him until the time of the announcement. I say the conditions in that legislature, as shown by subsequent events, were such that the Democratic members were ready to go to Mr. LORIMER, and I think they would have gone to Mr. Shurtleff if he had become a candidate. It became necessary, in order to meet the condition laid down by Mr. Browne, that he would not support Mr. LORIMER unless he was satisfied that he could be elected, and to meet the condition laid down by Mr. LORIMER that he would not be a candidate unless he could be assured that he could be elected without a contest on the first ballot—to ascertain these facts.

There is no question about that. Mr. LORIMER says he began to look around to see how many votes he could get; his friends began to look around; and there was a general looking around. When he left the city, at the end of the week before the election, he was satisfied that he would have sufficient votes, and he had no manner of question about that fact until he heard the rumor, when in Chicago, the Sunday night before the election, that Gov. Deneen was not for him. He returned to Springfield to make further inquiries, and he let one vote be taken on the 25th of May without permitting his name to be used. After that vote was declared he was satisfied that Gov. Deneen could not turn his friends away from him, and on May 26 he allowed his name to go before the legislature, and he received the election.

OPINIONS OF PROMINENT DEMOCRATS.

Mr. Homer E. Shaw, a prominent Democrat of the house, is a banker, a man of whom everyone thinks well, and as a legislator a consistent supporter of Mr. Stringer. He did not believe it was good policy for the Democratic Party to break away from its candidate and vote for any Republican. He therefore organized a club for the avowed purpose of holding the Democratic Party together and to secure its united support for the Democratic candidate. He testifies that after two or three days' effort on the part of himself and his associates he found it impossible to hold the Democrats together; that the Chicago Democrats were extremely friendly to Senator LORIMER; that their personal friendship for Mr. LORIMER was stronger than their party fealty and affiliations, and that he knew from the start that Mr. LORIMER was the most formidable candidate who could come before the legislature.

The evidence clearly establishes a situation in the general assembly relative to the election of a United States Senator which had no dependence whatever on corruption of any kind. This conviction was expressed in the testimony of witnesses like Mr. Isley and Mr. Tippit, to the effect that no Republican in the State stood as high in the estimation of the Democratic Party as did Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Isley, an attorney, a Democrat, testifies to that effect, and Mr. Tippit, who was leader of one of the Democratic factions in the legislature, and for six terms a member of the General Assembly of Illinois, said:

My understanding is that three-fourths, probably, of the Democratic State central committee favored the election of Mr. LORIMER to the United States Senate. I think that is true.

In the State of Illinois bipartisan combinations are common. They grow out of the constitution of Illinois, which provides for a representation of the minority in the legislature. For instance, from every senatorial district three representatives are elected to the house. Every person entitled to the franchise has three votes. The individual may cast all three of his votes for one of the three candidates, or he may cast two votes for one candidate and one for a second candidate; he may divide his votes or mass them, as I have suggested. The result is that if it is a Republican district the Democrats will mass their votes on one man and in that way secure a Democratic representative. Thus they are certain of a minority representation in the legislature. The possibilities of the system naturally bring about bipartisan arrangements between Republicans and Democrats in the various elections. These combinations are common, and you will find multiplied instances of them in every Illinois election, because of the differing conditions in different districts.

MR. LORIMER'S STANDING WITH THE PEOPLE.

Couple the foregoing conditions with the fact that Mr. LORIMER had become a leading figure and justly popular with thinking people in both political parties because of his able and enthusiastic leadership in the colossal scheme to connect the Great Lakes with the Gulf of Mexico by a waterway for ships—a scheme to the accomplishment of which he had devoted years of effort—until, as Gov. Deneen expressed it, he had become a "power" in the political circles of the State. Occupying that exalted position, he refused even to consider becoming a candidate for the Senate until forced to do so if Illinois was to be represented by two Republican Senators from that State in this body.

When Mr. LORIMER entered Congress the Chicago Drainage and Ship Canal was in process of construction. It is one of the most remarkable waterways in the world. When in Chicago last autumn I traveled from Chicago to Lockport on that canal, and was profoundly impressed by what I observed. It has a depth of 26 feet, and I was told by the engineer who accompanied us that, aside from the Panama Canal, it is the largest waterway construction of its kind in the world.

The scheme of extending that canal and using the water of the Great Lakes in connection with others to establish a ship canal to the Mississippi River, and thus connect the commerce of the Lakes with that of the Gulf of Mexico, giving an outlet to the great Mississippi Valley, is one which had been agitated for many years, but had never been seriously undertaken until the burden was assumed by Mr. LORIMER. Look at his record in connection with this magnificent scheme. As early as the year 1900 Mr. LORIMER induced the trustees of the drainage ship canal to give a banquet to Congress to discuss the deep-waterway proposition and thus give it national standing. On the 16th day of March, 1900, that banquet was given at the Raleigh Hotel in Washington, and was attended by substantially two-thirds of the Senators and Representatives in Congress. The entire evening was given to the discussion of this great project. The present Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], at that time chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, was present and called a special meeting of that committee for the following evening. The following day Mr. LORIMER introduced a joint resolution for the appropriation of $200,000 for surveys from St. Louis to Lockport. That joint resolution was reported favorably by the committee, the survey was made, and the Engineer Corps of the War Department reported to Congress that it was feasible to construct a 14-foot channel at a cost of $31,000,000.

To arouse public sentiment on the matter Mr. LORIMER, at his own expense, constructed a launch in which he journeyed, traveling only by daylight, from Chicago to New Orleans. He stopped at every hamlet, village, town, and city throughout the entire distance. He took on friends at every stopping place, using them as speakers at the next, and then excusing them to take on others, repeating this process the entire distance. He held meetings at every place, large and small, and everywhere organized Lakes to the Gulf deep waterway associations. An organization of the same character among Members of Congress was also perfected by him, of which he became president and Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY became secretary.

In 1906 a great convention was held at St. Louis, consisting of 1,100 delegates, brought together as the result of this work.

In October, 1907, another great convention was held at Memphis, at which were present 3,000 delegates, among them being found 50 Members of Congress and 18 governors of States in the Mississippi Valley and the President of the United States. In 1908 another and a still larger convention was held in Chicago to encourage this great work, and its success was contributed to by the attendance of President Taft and Mr. Bryan.

After the favorable report of the Engineer Corps an appropriation of $5,000,000, to extend the drainage canal to Lake Joliet, was refused, it having been urged in debate in Congress that the Illinois Members were interested in getting money enough to improve the water-power reach of the channel, but that having done that they would have little interest in the waterway to the Gulf; that what they wanted was to develop power to yield to the State of Illinois a revenue of $3,000,000 annually for rentals.

At that stage of the proceedings Mr. LORIMER proposed to Speaker Shurtleff and others the adoption of an amendment to the constitution of Illinois providing for the expenditure of some $20,000,000 in that cause as an evidence of the sincerity and good faith of the people of that State. That amendment was submitted to the people and was carried by an overwhelming majority. Before that was done, however, Senator LORIMER, as the testimony shows, spoke in every part of the State of Illinois, exhibiting maps, charts, surveys, as well as estimates of engineers, advocating the proposition in season and out of season. He formed associations throughout the State, composed alike of Democrats and Republicans, to carry on the work. Nothing of a political nature entered into the movement; it was a question which challenged the attention of all the people of the State; they became interested in it; they approved it and wanted it; and the constitutional amendment was adopted by a majority greater than was ever given by the people of that State for any other measure.

On the 6th day of January, 1909, the very day the legislature which elected Mr. LORIMER to the Senate was organized, he, here in Washington, introduced a bill to provide for obtaining lands and other property necessary for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works in the interest of commerce and navigation on St. Marys River, Mich., and an appropriation was made therefor during that session, its purpose being to control the waters coming into the Great Lakes through that river, such control to be utilized in connection with the establishment of the deep waterway between the Great Lakes and the Gulf.

Mr. President, I have called attention to these facts to show the power and influence which Mr. LORIMER had attained in his legislative experience and some of the elements of strength possessed by him at the time of his election, and to account for the general trend of public sentiment in the Legislature of Illinois toward him, thus bringing to view conditions which have never been understood in the Senate of the United States.

ELECTION OF SENATOR LORIMER.

On the 26th day of May, 1909, Mr. LORIMER's name was allowed to go before the general assembly and he was elected a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, receiving 55 Republican and 53 Democratic votes. On the next day the Chicago Tribune published an editorial, from which the following is taken as bearing upon then existing conditions in the legislature:

> The Illinois senatorial contest is over and the result needs no extended discussion. The Tribune can not approve it, but without regard to the personality of the new Senator elect. It does not think the result is right in view of the expressions of the voters at the primary last August. The Tribune has considered that the primary election ought to be held conclusive. It accepted the result of the primary and thereafter supported the candidate whom it had not originally indorsed. For the outcome some of the more ardent friends of the direct-primary law are largely responsible, and it does not alter the situation that some of the best Republicans in the legislature have voted for the newly elected Senator.
> That he has been elected largely by Democratic votes does not in itself disturb the Tribune. The Tribune will usually welcome the support of Democratic votes for Republican candidates, whether voting for a Republican Senator or a Republican President. The discontent of this paper relates to the Republican legislators and Republican leaders who have seen fit to ignore the results of a primary that ought fairly and justly to have been held binding.

NO CLAIM OF BRIBERY OR CORRUPTION WAS MADE BY ANYONE—THE ELECTION WAS REGARDED AS THE NATURAL OUTCOME OF A DEADLOCK WHICH HAD COVERED A PERIOD OF FOUR MONTHS.

Having traced the history of the election of Mr. LORIMER to its completion, I need only add that Senator LORIMER appeared in this body, bearing unquestioned credentials, took the oath of office, and served for a whole year.

THE BREAKING OF THE STORM.

On the morning of April 30, 1910, nearly a year after Mr. LORIMER entered the Senate, there appeared in the Chicago Tribune a story purporting to have been written by Charles A. White, which involved two propositions; first, the existence of a condition of corruption in the Illinois Legislature in the form of a jack pot made up of contributions from corporations interested in pending legislation, to be distributed among certain members of the general assembly, the purpose being to control legislation in which such corporations were interested, and having no reference whatever to the senatorial election; secondly, a specific charge that his, White's, vote for Senator LORIMER was the result of a definite agreement entered into by him with Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne on the night of May 24, 1909, that in consideration of $1,000 to be paid him by Browne he would vote for WILLIAM LORIMER.

On the 28th of May, 1910, Senator LORIMER addressed the Senate, denied White's story in every detail, charged a conspiracy against himself, and offered a resolution providing for an investigation of the circumstances connected with his election. The matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which acted through a subcommittee over which the then chairman of the committee, Senator Burrows, presided. The subcommittee made a report stating that after seeing, observing, and hearing Mr. White as a witness and taking into consideration other evidence bearing on the question of the truthfulness or the falsity of the testimony that he gave, it was the opinion of six out of seven of such subcommittee that no credence should be given to his testimony tending to establish bribery. In that report the full committee, with two exceptions, concurred. The case was exhaustively debated in the Senate, and on March 1, 1911, Senator LORIMER's right to retain his seat in the United States Senate was established.

It will be remembered that the Burrows committee in its report to the Senate stated that if the money paid to Mr. White came from any fund it must have been from a jack-pot fund, but that it had nothing whatever to do with Mr. LORIMER's election. That committee felt that it had no authority to investigate the character of that fund, and therefore this body was without any of the information which naturally would come from an investigation of that nature.

After Mr. LORIMER's right to retain his seat in the Senate had been determined it appears that a committee of the Illinois Senate, which has been called the "Helm committee," began its sittings in Springfield, and it compelled the attendance as a witness of Mr. Kohlsaat, of the Chicago Record-Herald, who just previous to that time had published an editorial in which he inquired "Do we know all there is to be known concerning the $100,000 fund that was raised to pay for LORIMER's votes?" and required him to testify as to the subject matter to which that editorial referred. He utterly refused to impart the source of his information, saying that it had come to him in confidence, and while he had faith in it himself he was not at liberty to disclose it. It resulted in the committee taking a recess for a week in order to give him time to consider. It was very evident that the committee intended to enforce its authority and to compel Mr. Kohlsaat to testify, and the public press announced that he was facing imprisonment should he continue in contempt of the committee's authority.

FIRST INTIMATION OF ANY CORRUPTION FUND.

As a result of this situation, Clarence S. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Co., the person from whom he had received that information and whose name up to that time and for more than a year he had concealed, came forward and announced that he was the author of the statement. Mr. Funk appeared before that committee and testified, and this was the very first definite suggestion even that ever came to the public of any specific fund that could have been used to promote the election of Mr. LORIMER, and this was the first intimation the Senate had concerning such a fund.

The testimony given by Mr. Funk before the Helm committee, as reported by that committee to this body, was as follows:

That in the latter part of the month of May, 1909, or the early part of the month of June, 1909, and shortly after the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate, he had a conversation in the city of Chicago with Edward Hines, of the Edward Hines Lumber Co., in which conversation Mr. Hines informed him that, with others, he had succeeded in electing Mr. LORIMER to the United States Senate at a cost to him and the other unnamed persons of about $100,000.

That the money so used had to be raised quickly and without any opportunity to consult persons who might have been willing to contribute to such election, and that he, said Hines, was then engaged in seeing people who might be willing to reimburse and pay back the said sum of $100,000, and that in pursuance of such purpose he sought Mr. Funk with a request that the company of which Mr. Funk was general manager should contribute $10,000 toward the reimbursement of the advancement theretofore made by Mr. Hines and his unknown associates, with the added direction that said contribution should be sent to Edward Tilden, at Chicago.

ACTION OF THE SENATE.

The newspapers teemed with accounts of the testimony given by Mr. Funk before the Helm committee, and on the day following Senator LA FOLLETTE introduced a resolution into this body providing for a new investigation of the case.

The press of the country, as I have said, gave great publicity to Mr. Funk's testimony before the Helm committee, and in support of his resolution Senator LA FOLLETTE made an address occupying parts of several days, exhibiting an interest in this matter which was honorable to himself and to the credit of the body in which he served, showing an earnest desire to go to the very bottom of the question and to ascertain the fundamental facts. In the resolution which he offered he referred to this newly discovered evidence which had appeared through the public press.

Other resolutions were introduced, but the debate in the Senate related more to the question of the composition of the committee than otherwise, and a resolution was adopted which committed the investigation to the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman.

The ground upon which the case was reopened, as stated by all of the resolutions and by almost every speaker, was that of newly discovered evidence, the story of Mr. Funk being its subject matter, coupled with the request of the Illinois Senate that this body take further action. I was of the opinion that the case ought to be reopened upon the grounds mentioned, that the Senate had authority to reopen the case, whatever one might think of the doctrine of res adjudicata and its application to cases of this character. I had in my mind, and in the few remarks which I then made I cited, the du Pont case, in which the report of the committee was drawn by the late Senator Hoar of Massachusetts. In it he said:

We do not doubt that the Senate, like other courts, may review its own judgments where new evidence has been discovered, or where by reason of fraud or accident it appears that the judgment ought to be reviewed. The remedy which in other courts may be given by writs of review or error or bills of review may doubtless be given here by a simple vote reversing the first adjudication. We have no doubt that a legal doctrine involved in a former judgment of the Senate may be overruled in later cases. But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their minds as to the law or fact which is involved.

THE PRECISE QUESTIONS TO BE INVESTIGATED.

The resolution which was finally adopted by the Senate contained two specific provisions. The precise question submitted to the committee for investigation was whether in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from Illinois there were used and employed corrupt methods and practices. The committee was further and specially instructed to inquire fully into and report upon the sources and use of the alleged jack-pot fund, or any other fund, in its relation and effect, if any, upon the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate.

Under the instructions contained in this resolution this committee spent in taking testimony alone 102 days. The evidence submitted to the Senate covers between eight and nine thousand printed pages; the time consumed in the consideration of this evidence has been so great as to become a burden to those who drew the report. Those who have done the committee the honor to read its report have found there recorded the salient facts of the case, with a reference to the record where evidence bearing upon each question may be found, as well as the opinions of the committee founded thereon. In the views of the minority, also presented to the Senate, further light and suggestion is to be found.

But to aid the Senate in coming to a correct solution of the questions involved I have thought it best to review a little more in detail some of the more essential features of the case and to call attention to some of the more important testimony.

THE JACK POT.

It may be best, in the first instance, to take up this question of the jack pot, which has excited so much interest, and ascertain what the evidence discloses in respect of its existence and its uses.

The Senate will appreciate, I think, the difficulty of securing evidence of the existence of a jack pot; that is, by any direct testimony, because men who contribute to such a corruption fund are loath to testify, and men who have been participants in it will not willingly disclose the facts. The committee has been compelled to receive more or less of hearsay testimony, and to treat it for what it is worth in the light of the surrounding circumstances. When we called as witnesses men whom we supposed might have more knowledge of the subject than others, because of their interest in the question and their efforts to ascertain the truth as to the alleged existence of such a fund, there was a pretty general consensus of opinion among them that for many years such jack. pots had been formed in the Illinois Legislature. Many members of that body in 1909 testified that they had never heard the question discussed; others that while it had been discussed, it was in a joking way; that, if a man changed his vote on any question, or if a bill passed or failed to pass, some one would ask, "What was in it?" or make other inquiry of that character; but there were thoughtful witnesses who testified to gossip and common report to the effect that in previous legislatures and in the legislature of 1909 corruption had been practiced either to secure or to retard legislation.

Mr. Hinman, editor of the Chicago Inter Ocean, testified that, while having no personal knowledge on the subject, it was a matter of common report, and that in his opinion and belief, there had been a jack pot in every legislature since he had lived in Illinois, a period of 12 years, and that common report connected the liquor interests with the jack pot.

Mr. Keeley, manager and editor of the Chicago Tribune, testified that he heard charges that there were jack pots; that various bills were "hold-up" bills; that money had been paid or solicited before their passage; that the liquor interests had contributed to it; that it was a matter of common gossip, but not of knowledge, and that, in his experience of 20 years in the newspaper business, it had been common gossip, but apparently incapable of proof.

Mr. Kohlsaat, editor of the Chicago Record-Herald, testified that it was the general impression that a jack pot had been an established institution in the Legislature of Illinois for years, although he had no definite knowledge on the subject.

The speaker of the house, Mr. Shurtleff, in his testimony, states that during his service in the legislature he heard many statements regarding corruption, some of which he thinks were seriously made and others in a jocular way; but, to be more specific, he says that in the spring of 1909 he was invited to a dinner by certain gentlemen from different parts of the country who were connected with railroads at which the subject of railroad legislation was discussed, and a protest made against the nature of bills that were introduced in the legislature, and they sought his cooperation, as speaker in the assembly of 1909, against bills and proposed legislation which they deemed radical. He does not remember the language used, but says that he absorbed the idea that in years back the railroads had felt that they had been blackmailed or compelled to pay tribute, and that the dinner was by way of a declaration of independence from such legislation, and to ask his assistance in the effort they were making to protect themselves against being held up and blackmailed. No particular bill was discussed and no specific instance alleged.

Gov. Deneen had become very much interested in this question of a jack pot, and in one of the political campaigns since Mr. LORIMER's election had made that a topic of discussion in some parts of the State. He testified in substance that there is a general understanding that the jack pots began in 1897 and have continued ever since. Concerning the existence of jack pots he did not profess to have any personal knowledge or to be able to state any definite facts, but he testified that it is the general understanding in Illinois that money is paid; that it accumulates in the hands of several men; and is distributed according to the judgment of the men who control it.

He further testified that he did not know upon what principle the pot was distributed, but assumed that the men who gather the fund, certain leaders, have the determining power as to how it shall be done. He testified that he had heard that railroads had contributed for years to protect themselves against legislation. He also mentioned gas companies, or the gas company of Chicago; also electric-light companies, the liquor interests, stock-yard companies, and elevator companies; and he thought that the Pullman Co. and the street-car companies have contributed; that such is the general rumor; that he does not know that it is based on facts at all; that he never made an investigation; and that he has no power or facility to do that—and yet that was his judgment, standing in the intimate relation to the legislature compelled by his duties.

Gov. Deneen became more specific in his allegations as the testimony went on, and testified that in the forty-sixth general assembly, that of 1909—the assembly which elected Mr. LORIMER to this body, railroad presidents from different parts of the country asked him to meet them, saying that bills were being presented that went to the length of confiscation of their property, and that under the Federal laws their books were examined to such an extent that they could not do what they were going to be asked to do, even if they wanted to; the implication being that their books, under the Federal law, were so examined that they could not make contributions to the Illinois Legislature, even if they wanted to do it, without discovery; that they were against such practices, except in self-defense, when men held them up at the point of a gun.

The governor testified that he told them that the only way to do would be to call in the leading men, to have them go down to Springfield in such numbers as to overcome the influence of the other men, and that they said they intended to make a stand against the practice, and that they would cease to be held up by them.

Gov. Deneen further testified that, according to the newspapers, they sent a thousand men down there at one time; that they were greatly excited about the matter, and appealed to him for aid. Further testifying, the governor said that the implication was that the railroads had been previously held up and that they took that method of defeating legislation instead of contributing to a jack pot.

From this evidence the committee found that the term "jack pot" as used by the people of Illinois and by the newspapers of that State referred to a supposed fund created by contributions of persons and corporations for the purpose either to secure or defeat pending or proposed legislation; such fund to be corruptly used for one of those purposes and divided, ordinarily, a considerable time after the adjournment of the legislature. So, without having any direct positive proof of the existence of this jack pot and nothing except what could be gathered from the circumstantial evidence adduced, but which satisfies me, personally, as to the existence of specific jack pots. the committee could only report that a general belief existed among many classes of people in Illinois that corruption funds, which had recently come to be known as "jack pots," have been more or less common in connection with the legislature of that State. As I have said before, personally I am fully convinced of that fact from the circumstances which have come to my attention.

THE JACK POT OF 1909.

This brings us to the question of whether there was a jack pot in the legislature of 1909, which elected a United States Senator. This is not only confessed, but it is asserted by men who know. Three members of that legislature have been before investigating committees and before courts—Mr. White, Mr. Link, and Mr. Beckemeyer. Link is dead, but his testimony has been preserved. There is, as has been suggested by my friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] in his speech the other day, reason to suspect that a considerable number in addition to those named were participants in this fund, but there is no satisfactory evidence of that fact. In the case of these three men, however, there can be no doubt about it, because of their own confessions and their own actions.

Before we go further let me state who Mr. White is. He is a young man. When he came to the legislature he was 28 years of age. He had been in various employments until he became a street car conductor at O'Fallon, Ill., and the largest wage he had ever received was $65 a month. In the preceding legislature he had been a "legislative representative," as he called himself, of certain labor organizations. He was a young, bright, and energetic fellow; he had made himself popular in labor circles; they had sent him to Springfield in 1907 as their representative to look after legislation there; and he was allowed $6 a day and his expenses, as against $65 a month, which he had received as a conductor.

He spent that session without profit to himself. The evidence all shows that he fell into dissipation and all manner of excesses. He came in contact with men whose influence upon him was such that his mind was filled with the thought of securing money without labor.

At the end of that session he returned to O'Fallon, but was not happy working for $65 a month. He interested himself at once in local politics, and through the influence of his labor organizations he secured an election to the General Assembly of Illinois which convened in January, 1909.

Link and Beckemeyer, whom I have mentioned, were also members of that legislature. Each one of these three received from the jack pot of that year $1,900. How did they receive it? Each one of them received $1,000 from Lee O'Neil Browne; each one of them received $900 from one Robert E. Wilson. The money came from the same source, and must have belonged to a common fund, and the nature of that fund must determine the controversy in this case. If that was an ordinary jack-pot fund that had been raised to control legislation, contributed to by parties who were interested in specific measures, either to retard or to give impulse to the passage of the same, it was the jack-pot fund to which the governor and the speaker referred in their testimony, which, after the close of the session, was divided among those who had been faithful followers of the leaders who had collected such fund. On the other hand, if that fund was raised to elect WILLIAM LORIMER, then the case is altogether a different one; and that is the question to which the attention of the Senate should be directed. And I want to call attention to the fact that nowhere in the record, from beginning to end, can there be found a word of testimony indicating that the fund from which these payments were made, either in its origin or application, had anything to do with the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States.

Charles A. White is the only witness who makes the charge that any money was raised or paid to anyone for voting for WILLIAM LORIMER. He says that Lee O'Neil Browne, when he paid him that thousand dollars, paid it to him because he had promised on the night of May 24, 1909, to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER, but even he admits that the $900 that came from Wilson was jack-pot money.

There you have from the chief witness in this case the admission of the existence of a jack pot in that legislature, a legislative jack pot, a corruption fund to control legislation. White admits it, and says the $900 came from that fund.

On the other hand, Link and Beckemeyer admitting that they, like White, got the $1,000 and the $900, both say it had nothing to do with WILLIAM LORIMER, but was all jack-pot money; a fact which I will demonstrate before I complete these remarks. And I want to say to Senators that when they determine this case they will be compelled to do so upon the claim made by White, that on the night of May 24 he was bribed by Lee O'Neil Browne to vote for Mr. LORIMER in consideration of $1,000, to be paid him in consideration of such vote. The case stands or falls upon the truth or falsity of his statement.

When the Senate comes to face the question in the light of all the record contains, it will be forced to determine whether, upon the testimony of Charles A. White, they will blast a fellow Senator's reputation and deprive the State of Illinois of the services of one whom its legislature has elected to this body.

What kind of a man was White? He had drawn in about seven weeks, and had spent his entire salary, mileage, and stationery allowance, amounting to $2,132. He admits that during the session he had communicated to Mr. Browne his embarrassed circumstances; he was a spendthrift; he was given to dissipation; and he says that Browne had said if things worked out all right he thought White would be able to make a little side money out of the session, as he did. He admitted that $900 of it was from that fund, and I will demonstrate that the whole amount, $1,900, was also from that fund.

When and how was this money paid? White was so hard up that he went to Browne before the legislature adjourned in order to get help, and he received $100 from him before he left Springfield.

Then White went to Chicago and received the balance of the thousand dollars, $50 on the evening of June 16, and $850 on the following morning, June 17. Now, what follows? On June 21, four days later, Mr. Browne went to St. Louis, out of the State, and there paid $1,000 each to Beckemeyer and Link. White was not present on this occasion, he having been paid the same amount as the other men who say it was jackpot money and that it had nothing to do with the election of Senator LORIMER.

A few weeks later, and on July 15, at the suggestion of Browne and Wilson—when you speak of one you must speak of the other, because they were acting fully in concert—all of these parties, including White, went to St. Louis, and there they were paid $900 apiece by Wilson.

Now, then, if there is any fact in the world that can be firmly established it is that these three men stood upon the same plane; that they were paid precisely the same sums of money by precisely the same persons and at substantially the same time. Link and Beckemeyer not only confess, but assert it was jack-pot money, and White admits that $900 of it was from that fund. It was a common fund and equally divided among these men.

Through whom did it come? I have already said that it came through Lee O'Neil Browne, the leader of the Democratic minority. Who Mr. Browne is will more fully appear as the discussion proceeds.

Now, then, how was this fund raised? Who were its contributors? The committee received little light on that subject. It is not easy to say how men are influenced in a legislature. The corruptionist does not confess his crime. He who receives the corrupt fund does not confess his guilt. But here is a suggestive incident taken from the testimony of Mr. Hull, who was a follower of Gov. Deneen. He is a bright man, a lawyer, and from Chicago. He referred to a bill introduced into the legislature to prevent brewers from having an interest in saloons which dealt in their products. That bill was considered by the committee on licenses and was favorably reported to the legislature—it was a unanimous report. He described how vigorously and earnestly the measure was supported; how the bill was urged on to its second reading in the afternoon of a certain day. It appeared as though it would be rushed to a third reading and to the question of its passage with the greatest possible speed. It received its second reading and went to the calendar. Mr. Hull suspected that the urgent support of the bill would have accomplished its purpose and that the bill would be allowed to die. In the evening he discovered it was not called up for a third reading by those who had previously pushed it so vigorously, so he arranged with the speaker to do so, and himself called it up for a third reading. What was the result? What was the vote on it? The committee, composed of 24 members, had unanimously reported the bill, On the question of its third reading only 2 of the 24 voted in favor of it, while 14 members of the committee voted against it. Eight were absent or not voting.

What was the inference? The inference was that after the bill had reached its second reading, having been pushed to that point with vigor, the matter was "arranged." It is surmised that this bill may have been one of the sources of the jack pot of 1909. That is as far as the committee could go in securing evidence in connection with that measure, but the facts already stated are eloquent in and of themselves; and if corruption existed in connection with liquor legislation, what can be expected in connection with other classes of legislation coming before that body?

White, in his jack-pot story, tells of a trip taken by him upon the Lakes in the following summer with Lee O'Neil Browne and others friends, while he was living a life of dissipation; that Browne stated to him at that time that had it not been for the veto of a certain bill by the governor at the close of that session there would have been $35,000 more paid into the legislative jack pot. He did not know what bill it was. This came to the attention of Mr. Keeley, of the Chicago Tribune, when he first read the White story. He went to Gov. Deneen for counsel. That circumstance was mentioned, and the governor thought he identified it as Senate bill No. 286, known as the "corporation bill," a measure which proposed to revolutionize a policy of Illinois, which had been in existence for 50 years, limiting the powers of corporations to absorb one another. By the terms of this measure any corporation might own stock in another corporation and might organize, as Gov. Deneen expressed it, as a barber shop and proceed to run a railroad. I will have more to say about this in another connection as we proceed. Its only bearing at this point is to indicate one of the ways in which jack pots are supposed to have been created.

WHITE'S STORY IS A FABRICATION.

Charles A. White's present story of having been bribed by the payment of a thousand dollars to vote for Mr. LORIMER is a fabrication to carry out the purposes of a corrupt mind. The evidence is conclusive upon this point.

Why did he invent this story?

His experience as a lobbyist the year before had opened his eyes to what was going on. He was a man of corrupt instincts. As I have said, up to that time he had been a street car conductor at $65 a month; in 1907 a legislative agent at $6 per day and expenses, and during that session he lived at a first-class hotel and fell into habits of extravagance and of dissipation. We have the testimony of William M. Rossell, secretary of the legislative committee of the Chicago Federation of Labor and vice president of No. 208, International Association of Machinists, who had been appointed by Gov. Deneen on a committee to investigate and prepare a bill for the health, comfort, and protection of employees in factories. He testified to a wild scheme that White had suggested to him, to the effect that they secure pictures of members of that legislature under compromising circumstances, give public entertainments about the State, one of them exhibiting the pictures and the other delivering a lecture regarding them, out of which, according to White's plan, they would make a "barrel of money." Whatever importance may be attached to that testimony, it simply indicates the character of White's mind and the direction in which it was running.

He went home and says that he heard one Pratt, a man connected with labor organizations, make a statement, in which he said that he had accepted a bribe of $5,000 and had used it himself, spent it for his own purposes. His justification of the act was that he had disclosed the fact to his associates; there was nothing wrong in taking it; that he had not done it secretly; that he had not been influenced by it, but he was boasting of it to his associates, and it was very evident that that story inspired White.

White was elected to the legislature of 1909, and he admits that he went to Springfield with such a purpose in view. Listen to his own statements:

Mr. WHITE. I did not say I had made the statement that I would accept bribes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was in your mind?

Mr. WHITE. That was in my mind when I did it; yes, sir; that I would.

Think of the character of that man's mind. In his testimony before this committee he attempted to justify boodling upon the ground that when bribes were given they were given by what he called "the interests"—I suppose he refers to corrupt interests—and he justified such action on his part on the ground that the money having come from such sources he had a perfect right to take it, because he could put it into circulation where it would do the common people some good. Those are the morals of the man upon whose testimony you must depend if Senator LORIMER is to be turned out of this body.

What was the relation between Mr. Browne and Mr. White? Mr. Browne, as soon as he was elected to the legislature, was a candidate for minority leader. White was a new member with a definite purpose. The senatorship was not a question. There was not a man in Illinois at that time who did not believe that one of the three candidates voted for in the primaries—that is to say, Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Foss, and Mr. Mason—would be elected, and the suggestion of Mr. LORIMER'S name was not made until nearly six months after Mr. Browne announced his candidacy and began canvass for the position of minority leader. The acquaintance between Browne and White began on the 20th of November, 1908, when Mr. Browne wrote Mr. White, addressing him as "Dear sir and fellow Democrat," congratulating him upon his election and announcing his candidacy and asking for White's support. In this letter he uses this language.

If I am honored by your support, I can assure you that that support will be appreciated sincerely and that you will find me ever ready to meet you fully along friendship's lines. If elected leader, I will do all in my power to be a leader for the good of the minority and its individual membership. I shall have the best interests and the record of that minority constantly at heart.

Then in a postscript he suggests a meeting at St. Louis at the Southern Hotel, Friday, November 27:

I shall be there at that time, and hope you will make it a point and find it possible to meet me and the others. I believe it to be somewhat important.

On the following day White received a letter from M. S. Link, whom I have mentioned. He had served in a previous legislature. He congratulates Mr. White upon his election to the house of representatives and says:

I think Lee O'Neil Browne, of Ottawa, will be chosen Democratic leader, and a worthy one he will make; and, my friend, I assure you that it is far better to be with the majority than on the outside. Take my advice and be for him.

November 23 Mr. White wrote to Mr. Browne saying that he has received several letters from members who desire to become the leader on the Democratic side, "but have not pledged myself to the support of anyone." The evidence does not show that there was a large number aspiring to that position. Mr. Tippit was a candidate. Mr. White continues:

I am inclined to believe you would make a worthy leader, because I think you have the ability and firmness that such position requires.

I will try and see you at the Southern Hotel, St. Louis, Friday, and have a talk with you.

Between November 23 and December 3, 1908, they held the meeting at St. Louis.

December 23 Browne called his supporters to Chicago for a conference, and he wrote White:

I am especially desirous and anxious to see you at my headquarters and have a talk with you the first thing Monday morning and before the meeting. I believe it to be important to both of us.

December 28 White thought so, too, and he was in Chicago at Mr. Browne's banquet, which was given at the Sherman House to his supporters.

December 31 Mr. Browne wrote to Mr. White urging White to be at the preliminary caucus of his supporters at 3 o'clock p. m., January 5, 1909; and in his letter of January 1 to Mr. White he says:

I hope you will find it possible to be at Springfield early Monday, or, better still, Sunday some time. While we have the other crowd beaten forty ways, as you saw clearly at Chicago on Monday, at the same time we must not let up for a minute. I shall rely on such good, solid friends as yourself and others like you to keep up the good work. All the members will get in Monday, and I would like to have you there and meet them and interview all the new members who are not with me. Try to get there early. My best regards to you, old man. We will win in a walk.

Then, in his postscript he suggested:

P. S. Have you sent for your transportation as yet?
Chicago & Alton, write to president Chicago & Alton Railroad, Railway Exchange Building, Chicago, Ill.
Illinois Central, write John G. Dieman, general counsel, Park Row, Chicago, Ill.
Wabash Railroad Co., write Col. Wells H. Blodgett, general counsel, St. Louis, Mo.
Pullman passes, write Hon. John H. Runnels, general counsel Pullman Parlor Car Co., Pullman Building, Chicago, Ill., for one-half dozen sets Pullman passes, and return, good 60 days.
More later, as soon as lists are made out.

I read these letters simply to show you these two men were being drawn together, Browne as leader and Mr. White as follower. After reaching Chicago White signed a written agreement to support Mr. Browne for minority leader, and he says he did it without objection. The caucus was held and Mr. Browne was nominated, but Mr. Tippit, who had also been a candidate, refused to stand by that action, and he organized a faction of his own containing 26 men, and thereafter during the session Browne and Tippit were leaders of different factions of the Democratic Party.

Mr. White's mental attitude is indicated by the fact that he testifies that the Illinois Southern Railroad Co. sent its attorney to him with a pass, asking him to vote against a certain specific bill—Senate 313—a bill that provided for making findings of fact by juries final, but he says that Browne advocated the bill and, although he had accepted the pass, he voted for it. Mr. White is not a modest man in his demands. Nobody, I think, who has heard him or has read his testimony, will conceive for a moment that he is. We find that early in the session in a letter without date he wrote to Mr. Browne, saying:

I herewith inclose you a list of the committees that I would like to be appointed on.

Here is the list of committees:

(1) Appropriations, (2) corporations, (3) deep waterways, (4) manufactures, (5) mines and mining, (6) penal and reformatory institutions, (7) railroads, (8) insurance, (9) to visit penal and reformatory institutions.

He was a man who did business on his own initiative. During that session Mr. Curran, chairman of the committee on labor, says that Mr. White requested him to hold up the women's 10-hour bill, which White, as a member of that committee, had agreed to have reported favorably; they had considerable discussion over it, and when Mr. Curran refused to hold it up, Mr. White said, "I thought you were a 'good fellow.'" What did he mean by that expression "good fellow"? Mr. Curran thought that he knew what he meant, although White made no explanation at that time; but we find that when White had prepared his story of the jack pot he told his counsel, Mr. Webb, to whom he submitted the manuscript to ascertain if he was making himself criminally liable, that he got $900 as a member of the "good-fellow gang." There is his own interpretation of that term, admitting, as he does, that it came from the jack-pot fund.

Mr. Doyle, who was inspector of boilers on the Wabash Road, went to Springfield to oppose certain provisions of several railroad bills, representing both the employees in certain departments of the railroads and the railroads themselves in that connection. He says that coming across the rotunda of the State House he met Mr. White.

Mr. HANECY. Charles A. White?
Mr. DOYLE. Yes, sir. He said to me, "How is railroad legislation coming on?" I said, "All right." He said, "You fellows are the damnest cheapest bunch I ever saw. How do you expect us fellows to live around here; on wind?" I said, "I do not know. I have not got a dollar to give you or to cite you to where you could get any. I am surprised at you making that statement, elected as you were." Somebody stepped up, and the conversation ended there.

White followed it up the next day, as the following testimony of Mr. Doyle indicates:

It was, if I am correct, the next afternoon. I was on the Democratic side, in the lobby there, and he came along and said, "You fellows had better get busy. You are not out of the woods yet." I said, "We are busy." I did not want to get into any argument with him, and walked away.
Mr. HANECY. You said that when you met Charlie White you said to him you did not have any money and could not give him any, and did not know where he could get it.
Mr. DOYLE. Yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. Or that in substance?
Mr. DOYLE. Yes, sir.

This is one of the incidents cropping out in evidence, indicating White's corrupt mind and his manner of approaching those representing different interests in that legislature.

Another significant circumstance occurs to me. The session had advanced to May 31. It was after the election of Senator LORIMER, which occurred on May 26. Mr. Browne wrote to Mr. White May 31, 1909:

It has been determined for everybody to be here for roll call on Thursday morning next. We will have to have a full house at that time in order to close up the business of the session and bring about a sine die adjournment. It can not be accomplished without a full attendance. Please be here for Thursday morning roll call.

It struck me as peculiar that the legislature could not adjourn without having a full house, but it occurred to me also that there is evidence in the case—the evidence of Gov. Deneen and others, which I dislike exceedingly to take the time of the Senate to read, but which may indicate why it was necessary to have a full house. He states that a large number of bills—800 to 1,300—are introduced during a session, and that they have about 60 committees to which the bills are referred.

The majority elect a speaker and the minority agree upon a leader. The speaker and the minority leader arrange for the appointment of the committees and their chairmen. Then the committees meet and begin their work. Gov. Deneen says:

The bills that are introduced to regulate corporations—they are all regulated out there—are introduced and receive about the same consideration. They get through one house and get up to the second reading in the second house—the lower house usually, because they are more numerous in number—and the struggle then begins to get those bills to action and to prevent action. At that time the date of adjournment is fixed by joint resolution, and they pass most of the legislation. For instance, in one of the legislatures that has been in session since I have been governor they passed about 235 or 240 bills. About 20 or 25 of those were passed the second day preceding the adjournment, and all the rest of them were passed in the last two days.

There, Mr. President, is the opportunity that has been suggested, when the work can be done. It is at a particular stage in the legislature. When time and circumstances combine to make possible "hold ups" of corporations which are interested in pending legislation and thus secure contributions to the jack-pot fund.

On February 26 I find that Mr. Browne was writing to Mr. White as one of his followers. He says:

The senate reapportionment bill will in all probability be sent across from the senate to the house on Monday next, and will be up for consideration in the house next week. For which reason, in addition to several other reasons, I believe it important that each member should be present on Tuesday morning next.

On March 5 he was writing to him at O'Fallon, saying:

I believe that it is absolutely necessary for you, as well as the rest of our fellows, to be present in the house next Tuesday morning when the session opens. Please be there without fail at that time.

I have read these letters to show that Mr. White was a follower of and on best terms with Mr. Browne, minority leader of that house, and that they sustained close relations.

HOW THE JACK-POT MONEY WAS PAID.

White left there June 5 or 6. June 7 he wrote to Browne.

Before leaving Springfield he had received $100 from Mr. Browne. There is no copy of the letter that he wrote to Mr. Browne after getting away, but he testifies:

At that time I had those offices, as I told you here some time ago, in East St. Louis, and they had practically drained all of my financial resources. I wrote Mr. Browne a letter, I think, asking him for some advice upon the question of my continuing that office and made a request of him that he give me the other money as soon as possible.

That is the unpaid portion coming to him of the thousand dollars that was to be paid to each of these men. He received a letter June 9 from Mr. Browne, which is quite long and full of meaningless expressions; but in it he uses this expression:

I would hardly know what to say to you without seeing you personally. In any event, unless you would care to see me before that time by coming here or meeting me in Chicago, I expect to see you and have a visit with you some time within the next two weeks. I shall be only too glad to advise with you along the line of the matters referred to and suggest anything that may be appropriate and proper. You know where I stand, old man, and that I will go my length for you. Should you find it necessary to see me before the end of the next two weeks you had better arrange to come to Chicago and meet me there.

Later on in the letter he says:

I want you to feel and realize that I am as good a friend as you have in the world, and that I am not only willing but ready to do anything in my power for you at any time.

Mr. REED. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The date of that letter is June 9.

Four days later Browne wrote to White at the Briggs House, Chicago, saying:

FRIEND CHARLES: Your letter did not reach me till too late to do any good. I was in Chicago, but could not have remained longer had I got your letter. Got home here this evening and am due in court to-morrow a. m. But, Charlie, I will be in Chicago Tuesday or Wednesday sure (this is under your hat, though, for I do not want to be bothered by every job hunter in Chicago). If you can wait, I'll do my best to see you. I'll be at the Briggs when there.

Three days later, June 16 and 17, White was in Chicago and met Browne at the Briggs House, and in the evening Browne gave him $50 in money and the next morning he paid him $850, which, with the $100 paid him in Springfield, made the thousand dollars which he says he received from Browne; and this was only four days before Browne went to St. Louis and paid the same amount to the other men. It was a common fund which he was dividing. White was simply one of the participants.

Mr. REED. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I should like to have him answer another question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Is it conceded that Browne did pay this sum of money—a thousand dollars—to White?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Absolutely; and he paid a like sum to three or four others; probably more.

Mr. REED. And that was a corruption fund of some kind?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is what I think.

Mr. REED. Now, is it not true that Senator LORIMER contributed $10,000 to the defense of this man Browne who, you admit, and who the record clearly shows, had been guilty of corruption?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He did; and I will explain the circumstance. I will do it very fully and be very glad to do it——

Mr. REED. Very well; I shall be pleased to hear the explanation.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That question came up at the first meeting between the State's attorney, Mr. Wayman, and the manager of the Chicago Tribune, Mr. James Keeley, before the Tribune bought the story from Charles A. White. At that time Mr. Wayman told Mr. Keeley that White's story was only a 20 per cent story at best, and he also told him that Mr. LORIMER would be obliged to defend any man charged with receiving money because of his vote for him for United States Senator, because the Tribune fight was against Mr. LORIMER and not against the corruption in the Illinois Legislature. I think I would have done the same had I been in Senator LORIMER's place. If the same combination had been working to convict a man, and through that man to charge me wrongfully with having been the beneficiary of corruption, I would spend all my money in an effort to destroy such a conspiracy.

Mr. REED. And to clear a man who had been guilty of corrupting the legislature?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No, sir; not at all. I do not say anything about Lee O'Neil Browne in connection with legislative corruption.

I am not standing here to defend him. But when an attempt is made to connect that fund with Senator LORIMER's election I stand here to deny the right to do it on the evidence and record in this case. They have failed in the courts of Illinois to do it. Every time the question has been decided, where the principles of law and justice could be applied; where the tryers acted in a judicial capacity upon their convictions and upon knowledge, an acquittal has followed.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; and also the reelection of Mr. Browne; and the Senator stands here and admits they are guilty of the grossest corruption. I want to say this. I think the Senator did not mean to say that he would in any way under any circumstances have put himself in the position of defending that sort of a man. I can not imagine the Senator doing that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If I found that in a case like this men had been paid money corruptly for their action in the legislature, knowing that it had nothing whatever to do with me, and it was attempted by a combination of political enemies to make it appear that it was money that I had furnished or that my friends had furnished for my election, and the issue was to be tried in the court, one man having been charged as the agent through which it was claimed it was done, I would have defended him to the extent of my means and my power. That is just what I mean.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, does not the Senator think that it would be more pertinent to defend himself instead of standing to defend, if not a self-confessed, at least a clearly guilty rogue?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is just precisely what Senator LORIMER was doing. It was self-defense, and nothing but self-defense.

Returning to the question under discussion, when Mr. White tells about taking that thousand dollars from Lee O'Neil Browne he gives himself away in the statement he makes, and I want the Senate to give attention to the fact. He shows that it was a part of this general corruption fund to control legislation. Continuing his testimony, he says:

During this conversation he said that some of the Chicago members wanted to handle the Chicago end of it, but that he was going to handle it himself.

What is the "Chicago end" of a case of bribery between Browne and White? I wish somebody would tell me.

During this conversation he said that some of the Chicago members wanted to handle the Chicago end of it, but that he was going to handle it himself.

What does it mean? It means the fund from which that thousand dollars came.

He went on to say that a little later on, about the 15th of July, he would be able to give me that much or a little more.

To what did it relate? To the $900 that was paid him on the 15th of July; and that was a part of the same fund that he was receiving at that time.

He told me that he expected to be in St. Louis in a few days and meet these members from southern Illinois and give them their money.

It was all one fund, Mr. President. There were Chicago parties; there were those he was to meet at St. Louis. He had just paid White $1,000. "Next month I will pay you $900 more." It was all one fund. It had nothing to do with LORIMER, and I want Senators to understand, if they are to sit here and vote according to their oath of office and on the evidence in this case and as they would act if sitting in a court of justice, that they have no evidence but the uncorroborated story of Charles A. White upon which to unseat Mr. LORIMER; and he, in this very story, fully admits that he was one of several who was sharing in a fund which had no connection with Mr. LORIMER's election.

White adds:

I requested him to let me know when he was down there, and I told him I would come over and meet him. He did not do it, though.

Of course he did not. There was no occasion to notify White to meet him in St. Louis when Browne went there to make the first distribution to the others, because White, who was hard up and had been importuning him for money, had received his thousand dollars, his first distributive share of the fund, in advance.

He proceeds:

Mr. MARBLE. Was anything else said?

Mr. WHITE. Yes. He said that he ought to have more out of it than the other members.

More out of what? The thousand dollars that he was to pay White for voting for LORIMER? Consider the nonsensical character of such a claim. That he ought to have more out of it than anyone else because he had assumed a greater risk. Of what was he talking? He was talking about this common corruption fund that he was distributing. Such language would not have been employed in regard to a transaction confined to two individuals.

Then Browne added, after having said "that he ought to have more out of it than the other members"—

"You couldn't tell some of the members that." He said that he took a greater chance than some of the members. I think he suggested at that time that the governor had vetoed a bill that there had been $35,000 put up to secure the passage of.

But I am coming to that later.

Charles A. White absolutely admits that the thousand dollars he received was a part of the fund to which reference has been made and which was being distributed in different sections, and not to anything else.

What are the facts? Browne did meet the others on June 21 at St. Louis and paid them a thousand dollars apiece. Wilson did meet them on the 15th of July, as it had been suggested by Browne, and paid them $900 apiece. White was there and was one of them, and never has denied that it was jack-pot money.

What did he mean by "the Chicago end of it"? The Chicago end of what? The evidence does not disclose; we do not know; we can only imagine. Yet Browne was saying that about July he could give him about as much more money. He did give it to White. He admits it and says it was jack-pot money.

This is just exactly what Mr. Keeley, the editor of the Chicago Tribune, understood when he had read that story of White's and was considering the purchase of it. It came into his possession on the 11th day of March, and on the 16th day of March Mr. Keeley sought counsel from his friend, Gov. Deneen, bringing him from Springfield to Chicago in response to his request by telephone for that purpose. Mr. Hanecy asked Mr. Deneen this question:

What, then, was said, except that Keeley told you that he had a story of that kind?

Keeley had not bought the story; he was trying to find out whether the venue of any prosecution for bribery would be in Chicago, in Cook County, or whether it would be elsewhere. The value of that story to him depended almost wholly on whether the case would be tried in Chicago or whether it must be done at Springfield. The Tribune is published in Chicago.

Gov. Deneen testifies regarding his interview with Editor Keeley:

He outlined in a general way the character of it; that money was put in a jack pot; that men were voting and receiving money for it; that they were voting; that they did not know for which ballot they were receiving money; that the leaders would not tell them; that they voted for bills that they supposed had money in them when there was not, and the reverse.

In other words, they followed their leaders in the legislature.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator believes, I think, that Mr. White was one of Mr. Browne's followers, and that he voted according to Mr. Browne's wishes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will show that later.

Mr. CUMMINS. What was it that made Mr. White one of Mr. Browne's followers?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is a story which I will tell before I get through, for I intend to tell the whole story.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand from what the Senator has just stated that the money that was paid by Mr. Browne to Mr. White was at least one of the considerations for the leadership which Mr. White recognized on the part of Mr. Browne.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will permit me, I will tell him just what my thought is about that and what I think the testimony tends to establish. I think that in the house of representatives of 1909 there was much antagonism between the two factions, the Browne and Tippit factions, but that each became more cohesive as a faction as time went on, until it came at last to a point where each followed, almost without question, the leader in legislative matters.

I do not find from the evidence anything tending to show any corrupt bargain between Mr. Browne and any one of those men, except that one remark of Mr. White's, where he told Browne how hard up he was and he promised that if things worked out all right he thought he would be able to make a little side money out of the session. I think it is just the way Mr. Wayman put it after he talked with these men in the grand-jury room; that they trusted their leaders without a word having been spoken between them, expecting after the legislature was over and everything had passed by that if "there was anything in it," as some of them expressed it, it would be divided fairly.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the precise point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate and the Senator from Vermont. Mr. Browne established a leadership. He was unable to maintain it without paying his followers, and he did pay for their implicit obedience to his wishes. Mr. Browne voted for Mr. LORIMER, and because Mr. Browne voted for him Mr. White voted for Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The evidence does not show that. I am coming to that in a moment, if the Senator will give me time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was wondering whether the Senator differentiated between the vote Mr. White cast for Mr. LORIMER——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I say that emphatically and I will make it clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the vote that he cast for the other measures following Mr. Browne. I never have been able to see that if he was——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will be patient I think I will demonstrate it to him before I get through.

Mr. CUMMINS. That if he was paid for following Browne, and if in following him he voted for Mr. LORIMER, and if enough men to change the result were like Mr. White in that respect and followed Mr. Browne for money, and following him voted for Mr. LORIMER, I never have been able to see how we could escape the conclusion that the election was secured through improper means.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator will sit patiently by——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. And my strength holds out and the weather does not overcome me, I will try to differentiate along the lines the Senator has suggested and tell just how the evidence appears to me. I am trying to help the Senate get at the truth of this matter. While I have met Mr. LORIMER a great many times since this hearing began, I have never spent 30 minutes with him in my life. I hold no brief for him; I hold no brief for the Senate; I stand here as the chairman of a committee; and I am trying to place before the Senate what I believe the truth to be in relation to this matter. I will try to treat it fairly, and when I come to that point I will try to elucidate it, so that the Senator will see at least what my thought is about it.

Mr. President, when interrupted I was speaking of the jack pot and demonstrating that the $1,000 paid White was not paid in consideration that he vote for LORIMER. He admits it over and over again. Note the following:

Senator JONES. Did Mr. Browne ever indicate to you how much he had distributed——

Mr. WHITE. No, sir.

Senator JONES. Out of the jack-pot fund, or to whom he had distributed it except yourself?

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; I stated—he might have stated——

Senator JONES. I do not want what he might have said.

Mr. WHITE. Well, as I remember it, he did state at one time that he had treated all his fellows alike—new members and old—all the fellows alike in that respect.

He had been just to the new men as well as to the old. It was the common fund that he was distributing.

Mr. White admits that he followed Mr. Browne generally. Here is his testimony on that point:

Mr. MARBLE. With whom did you affiliate and work during that session of the legislature?

Mr. WHITE. I was one of the Browne supporters. I recognized Browne as the leader. They had had trouble there in their organization. Mr. Tippit organized a body of men, of 26 or 27, in what was known as the Tippit faction. They withdrew from the leadership of Mr. Browne, and I remained with the leadership of Mr. Browne.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MARBLE. Were you governed in your vote upon any measure by his direction, or advice, or leadership?

Mr. WHITE. Well, not in every instance. I pursued Mr. Browne upon matters I was not thoroughly familiar with. I followed him along those lines somewhat, but then on other questions I did not vote with him.

Mr. MARBLE. How did you determine what your vote should be upon questions where you felt you had no knowledge of your own?

Mr. WHITE. I usually followed and voted with Mr. Browne and the other members from the rank and file of labor. Mr. Morris was the secretary-treasurer of the Illinois State Federation of Labor, and his vote came before mine.

When this combination was formed it was simply, in my judgment, a continuance of the old system, concerning which Gov. Deneen and others testified. Mr. LORIMER's candidacy at that time had not been thought of. Everyone expected that Mr. Hopkins would be elected, or, if not, that Mr. Foss would be elected. They had not at that time begun to consider the possibility of any other candidate, nor to talk about any other candidate; and Mr. LORIMER long after that, three months after that, even when it was urged upon him, was declaring that he did not want the office of Senator, as he preferred to remain in the House; in fact, Mr. LORIMER was never mentioned in connection with the senatorship so that it got into any newspaper until May 14, four months after the organization of that house, when the announcement was made in the Chicago Tribune correspondence that his name was being suggested. He testifies that it was about the 12th of May that he began to tell his friends that, if he could have the nomination without a contest, perhaps he would take it; but during that entire session not a suggestion looking to his election was made, and, however corrupt the legislature may have been, no one dreamed of attaching fraud to Mr. LORIMER's election.

It was not until he had been in the Senate a year that this man White came out with his story. The Tribune publication was based entirely upon White's story, and that having been disproved by his own statements, as well as those of his associates who, like him, received $1,900 from the jack pot, the Senate, as I said before, is left to stand on White's declaration alone that $1,000 was paid to him as bribe money for voting for Mr. LORIMER.

There is the evidence just as it would go to a jury. That man White's mind is so corrupt that he can not think straight. Although he knew that he had voted for Senator LORIMER without corruption, he was fearful that some one might have received something in which he had not shared, and the very day after the election he went to Mr. Curran, the chairman of the committee on labor, with whom he served, and the man whom he had approached corruptly, but unsuccessfully, to ascertain if anything had been paid for Lorimer votes. He explained his inquiry by the remark that he did not want to be "double-crossed." This clearly indicates that he had received nothing for voting for Mr. LORIMER the day before, and he was wondering if others had. In other words, if he had been "double-crossed."

WHITE FULLY INTENDED TO VOTE FOR LORIMER.

Now, let us go a step further. Charles A. White fully intended to vote for Mr. LORIMER. He was advised to do so. He did do so. Mr. John O'Neill, a friend of his and business agent of the Firemen's Association, who represented the Chicago Federation of Labor before the forty-sixth general assembly in 1909, and who became acquainted with White during that time, testified that in conversation with White, about a week before the election, he expressed the wish that they might break the deadlock because all their legislation was tied up by it. White said he thought it would not last much longer and inquired:

Who do you think will be the man?

To which Mr. O'Neill replied:

I do not know; but, if you ask me, Charlie, as a Democrat, I will tell you what I think. If I was a Democrat and a member of the house, knowing Mr. LORIMER as I do, and from what I hear of Senator Hopkins, I certainly would not hesitate in voting for LORIMER, if there is not any possible chance of electing a Democrat.

White then asked him if he knew Mr. LORIMER very well, and he replied:

I have known him pretty nearly all my life.

White said:

A great many of the boys seem to think the same of him, and I would not be surprised if a great many of them will vote for him—meaning the Democratic members.

For more than a week prior to the election of Mr. LORIMER, and before his alleged interview with Browne, it had been the intention of White to vote for Mr. LORIMER if an opportunity to do so occurred, as is shown by other evidence.

Mr. LORIMER testifies that about 8 or 10 days before he was elected he met White in the house of representatives, and White volunteered the statement that he was going to vote for him. White said to Mr. LORIMER that he understood he was going to be a candidate, and said that if he was he would vote for him. Mr. LORIMER stated, in that connection, that 95 per cent of the street car men in Chicago always voted for him, because of the fact that he had been one of them, and he received the impression that White intended to vote for him for the same reason.

We have further testimony of his purpose which is absolutely convincing. It comes from Homer E. Shaw, a Democrat, a banker at Dement, Ill. Mr. Shaw is a man of sterling character and an estimable citizen. He was chairman of an organization of Democrats in the house, which he originated for the purpose of holding their forces together in sufficient numbers to make impossible the election of Mr. LORIMER. His word can not be doubted. He did not dislike Mr. LORIMER personally. His only objection to his election was that he was of opposite political faith, and Mr. Shaw believed in standing by his own party, and considered it bad political policy not to do so.

He thought—quoting his language—

It was a very bad idea for any Democrat to vote for a Republican for Senator.

The result was that Mr. Shaw organized this committee to work just as diligently as possible to bring the Democrats together and to hold them together and to prevent the election of a Republican. He is a high-minded man, whom any Senator upon this floor would be bound to believe if he heard him testify; and he testified from the attitude of a Democrat who was opposed to the election of Senator LORIMER. What does he say?

He says that three or four days, or possibly a week, before the election of Mr. LORIMER Mr. White made to him the assertion "that he would vote for BILL LORIMER if he got a chance"; and Mr. Shaw says:

I told him that I thought it would be a very unwise thing for him to do; that he was a new man in his district and was undoubtedly well thought of there at the time; and that knowing, as I did, the character of the people in his district I thought it would be a very unwise thing for him to do. He made the remark, in substance, that he did not give a damn what the people thought about it; he was going to do it anyway. I think I told him, to the best of my recollection, that if he did do this and went back to O'Fallon his best friends would not have anything to do with him—would not speak to him.

This conversation was, it clearly appears, prior to May 24, when, White now says, he first heard of the candidacy of Mr. LORIMER, and when he was bribed.

Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne testified that the only conversation worthy of the name which he had with Mr. White relative to the matter of the candidacy of Mr. LORIMER occurred in the lobby of the St. Nicholas Hotel something in the neighborhood of a week before the election, and in this connection Mr. Browne says:

I do not just now recollect how the conversation came up, whether I asked him if he could vote for Senator LORIMER or whether he first broached the subject; but in any event he said to me that he felt very kindly toward Senator LORIMER, felt favorable to his candidacy, and that he was going to vote for him and had told Mr. LORIMER that he was going to do so—had already told him so himself. I do not think he told me where he had told him that. He further said to me, "LORIMER is a good friend of organized labor, or the labor men tell me so, and for that reason I feel very kindly toward him. I understand that he has been a street-car man and came up from a street-car man, and," he said, "I am one, too, and for these reasons I am going to vote for Senator LORIMER."

That it was his intention to vote for Mr. LORIMER is made clear by the first expression given by White after the election, explaining the reasons for his vote in the following letter, which was written before he conceived the idea of extorting money by blackmail. The letter is dated May 29, 1909, three days after the election, and is addressed to Hon. Fred J. Kern, Belleville, Ill.:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., May 29, 1909.

MY DEAR MR. KERN: I received the copy of your paper, the News-Democrat, and read with great interest your editorial relative to the position of the Democratic members of the legislature taken in settling the longest drawn-out senatorial contest ever experienced in the history of the State of Illinois.

It gives me pleasure to know that there are men in public life prominent in the Democratic Party who can work upon a situation of this character with as broad and liberal views as you have expressed yourself through the editorial of your valuable paper.

Further along in the letter he says:

I felt it a public duty, after careful conference with older and more experienced workers in the Democratic ranks, to cast my vote for the Hon. William H. Lorimer for United States Senator.

I will not read the whole letter, which is lengthy. But in conclusion he says:

You may state, if you desire, the substance of my communication to you through your press, that there may be no misunderstanding as to the motive of not only myself but of the 53 loyal Democrats that voted for a Republican for United States Senator.

CHAS. A. WHITE.

WHAT INSPIRED WHITE TO BECOME A BLACKMAILER?

Having shown that all the money this man received came from some source wholly disconnected with the election of Mr. LORIMER; that it was his full intention to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER; that he did vote for him, and that after he had done so he thanked men who approved his course, it behooves us to look about and see why, through what influence, by what combination of circumstances Charles A. White came to conceive the villainous course which he has adopted to rob WILLIAM LORIMER of his reputation and of his place in the Senate and of his standing in the world. The evidence shows that it was born of greed and of avarice, and pursued with a wicked disregard to truth and honor, which stamps him as the lowest of his species.

THE INCEPTION OF WHITE'S STORY.

The legislature adjourned in June. White had a losing business proposition at East St. Louis that he was closing up. He faced the prospect of going back to work on a street railway at $65 a month, after having enjoyed all the pleasures of Springfield, not only for a season, but for two seasons. He had squandered all his money. Within two months after the legislature convened he had received $2,130 as salary, and before the 6th of May he was penniless and was borrowing money. This fact indicates the kind of life he led while in Springfield.

Immediately following the adjournment of the legislature he received from Browne the $1,000 and from Wilson the $900, making $1,900. His receipts during that period of six months were $4,030. Yet when he went up to Chicago in July, or the first of August, and entered upon a course of gross dissipation with Browne and some of his friends, out of that whole amount of money only about $500 remained unexpended. He had spent $3,500 during the winter and early spring, and much of it in ways which were not wise.

During the week spent with Browne and others dissipation of a most reckless character was indulged in. He loaned Mr. Browne $200, and he admits that in that single week he spent the remaining $300. It was "wine, women, and song," as some of the witnesses have expressed it. They took boat trips on the lake; and when at a week's end they returned to Chicago, about the 19th of August, White was obliged to borrow money to pay his hotel bill and get home.

I have before me a letter from one of his companions on the boat trips which indicates the speed at which they had been going:

Hope it will do some good, anyway. I am down at the "grind" again, working like a slave. It's sure h—l after the "music and flowers" we had for a time this summer. But when a thing has got to be done I can always shut my teeth and go to it. It's the only way. It's hell, but that's the price we pay for most of the pleasure of life. I always did, at least. Good-bye, old man, and God bless you.

White had returned physically and morally wrecked. He had squandered his means, was without employment, and having acquired expensive habits, he must invent means to gratify them. Financially, physically, and in spirit he was at the bottom of the hill. In his depression he became desperate and planned great things and how to accomplish them.

In talking with some of the men with whom he had been associating, Mr. Sturmer and Mr. Zentner, he outlined the plan which he had conceived to obtain more money. He said to them at that time, August 19, 1909, that he was going to take a big trip in the fall and winter; that he was going to his home in O'Fallon first, then down to New Orleans, then to Cuba, and up to New York; that he was going to have a big time in New York and then come back home again.

Zentner remarked that he must have a lot of money to spend. White said:

No; I have not a lot of money, but I am going to get it, and I am going to get it without working. * * * That Lorimer crowd and our old pal Browne, too, have got to "come across" good and hard when I say the word, and I am going to say it.

Mr. Zentner then asked him if he had anything on them—that is, any evidence against them. Mr. White replied:

No; I aint. I got the worst of it down there in Springfield, but that makes no difference. I voted for LORIMER, and I am a Democrat, and I can say I got money for voting for LORIMER.

There was the inception of this charge that is embodied in the Tribune story: "I am a Democrat, and I voted for LORIMER, and I can say I got money for voting for LORIMER." White continued: "Do you suppose they can stand for it a moment? I guess they will cough up when I say the word to them." Mr. Zentner said: "God, you would not treat Browne that way, would you?" To which White replied: "I am looking out for White, and, besides, Browne would not have to pay. That bunch behind him would have to, and it would not hurt him."

These men, Zentner and Sturmer, considered this an idle boast. They knew White had not fully emerged from his intoxication, and they looked upon it as the utterance of a man who had not recovered his balance. But it appears, as a matter of fact, that the idea did have foundation in White's mind, and that he saw in the circumstance that he, a Democrat, had voted for a Republican, coupled with the payment to him of $1,900 from the jack pot by Browne, a basis for fabricating the charge that he had been bribed by Browne to vote for Senator LORIMER, because immediately thereafter he began the preparation of his "jack-pot" story. White testified that he commenced to write the story the last of August, or the first of September, and as early as September 7, only three weeks after the conversation wherein he first asserted his purpose, he wrote to Doubleday, Page & Co. to make inquiries as to the manner in which they published articles of that character; and in other letters he informed them of the nature of his manuscript. He also carried on a correspondence with Everybody's Magazine, to which he wrote on the 9th of September, two days after writing Doubleday, Page & Co., and fully informed them of the nature of his manuscript. This correspondence with these companies continued from time to time down to February 11, 1910, at which date he turned over the manuscript to Doubleday, Page & Co. for examination.

While he was engaged in the preparation of this story White on two or three different occasions talked with Katherine A. Woods, the owner of a cigar stand in the Illmo Hotel, at East St. Louis. He was on friendly terms with Miss Woods, and occasionally took her out to dinner and to the theater, etc. He told her over and over again of this scheme of his, and she undertook to dissuade him.

He told her that he was writing a history of his life and of the Illinois Legislature; that he expected to make a fortune out of it; and that the Lorimer bunch would have to pay him enough money to keep him the rest of his life, and if the Lorimer bunch did not do it, he would make it hot for LORIMER; that he was going to run for Congress; that rich people of Chicago were backing him; that he had spent $3,000 and a lot of time in making the history of his life and of the Illinois Legislature, and that he was going to get it back.

Surely he had that purpose in mind. The only thought the man had was that he must rehabilitate himself financially in some way. Conscience did not oppose inclination, and he entered upon a scheme to secure money, and by blackmail if necessary. Meantime he conceived an additional plan. He wrote a letter to Hon. Roger C. Sullivan, Democratic national committeeman from Illinois. It shows another scheme on the part of White to obtain money. In it he says:

My friends by the score are urging me to enter the race in this congressional district for Congress.

Two of the leading daily newspapers have been urging me to enter the race, and want to begin booming me as a probable candidate.

What is your opinion of the matter?

But the point of the letter is in the following passage:

I realize it will take a large sum of money to put up the right kind of a fight and do not know that much money could be raised here.

I would not consent for the use of my name unless there was the proper assurance of sufficient funds to carry on a stampede campaign.

Mr. Sullivan replied to the letter very politely, but says in closing:

In reference to finances, will say the State committee has no funds whatever to give to any condidates, the treasury being completely exhausted, and I know of no place outside of your district where funds could be secured.

So that scheme for making money failed.

We come down to Thanksgiving time, when he has another interview with Miss Woods, in which White told her—to watch the Chicago papers, for he was going to make out of the Lorimer bunch enough to live comfortably, and that when he got the trouble started he was going on a trip to Europe and to let them fight it out.

About centennial week, in St. Louis, 1909, White told Miss Woods:

I have got it in for LORIMER, Senator LORIMER and his bunch, and they will have to come across or I will make them pay dearly for it. I have spent $5,000 this session having a good time and looking up the dope on them. I have a friend in Chicago who will back me up and furnish me all the money I want.

Throughout all this, as I have said, he was looking for some chance to get money, but never by honest employment.

It was the one idea in his mind. Very soon after his talk with Miss Woods, having failed to secure from Mr. Sullivan any promise of a large sum of money to conduct his campaign, having failed also in his efforts with Everybody's Magazine and Doubleday, Page & Co., on December 4, 1909, White, pursuant to the same plan and in accordance with his avowed purpose, addressed to Senator LORIMER a letter, which has been published far and wide. I presume it is familiar to every Member of this body.

The letter referred to is as follows:

O'FALLON, ILL., December 4, 1909.

Hon. WILLIAM LORIMER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am preparing to place before the people of this country an article I have written giving my true experience as a member of the Illinois Legislature. The article will appear either in book form or will be published in one of the largest magazines in the United States.

I have just completed the manuscript, which contains about 30,000 words, giving in detail my absolutely true experiences as a member of the forty-sixth assembly. As yet I have not closed a deal with any publishing house, but when my terms are acceptable will dispose of it.

I have been offered a sum sufficient to value the manuscript at about $2.50 per word.

Believing that you would be more deeply interested in the works and actions of the members of the last session of the Illinois Legislature, owing to the fact that possibly your experience with that general assembly will be one of the questions freely discussed, and assuring you that I have severed all connections with the party leaders, as well as am to be independent in the future in all my political dealings, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

CHAS. A. WHITE.

Note this passage:

I have just completed the manuscript, which contains about 30,000 words, giving in detail my absolutely true experiences as a member of the forty-sixth assembly. As yet I have not closed a deal with any publishing house, but when my terms are acceptable will dispose of it.

I have been offered a sum sufficient to value the manuscript at about $2.50 per word.

There are two lies in that statement. He now admits that he had not finished the manuscript at that time, he admits that he had not received an offer for it at that time. It was an unblushing attempt to blackmail WILLIAM LORIMER, and to extort money from him—to extort $75,000 from him.

He attempts to explain this by saying that he hoped to bring from Mr. LORIMER some admission that he could use against him. Why? Because he admits in his testimony that he had nothing against him. But all the evidence goes to show that it was not to get an admission from Mr. LORIMER. It was to extort money from Mr. LORIMER that he wrote that letter.

Mr. LORIMER with the rare understanding of human nature, which evidently he possesses, judged the man accurately, and in replying to this letter used the following language:

I am in receipt of your letter of December 4, in which you advise me that you have manuscript ready to place with the publishers, treating on your experience as a member of the Illinois Legislature. I would be very glad, indeed, to note your success as an author.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,

WM. LORIMER.

Think of that proposition! That man testifies that between the time he conceived that story and the time he attempted to blackmail WILLIAM LORIMER he remained in Chicago, trying to ferret out something that he could work into a story against Lee O'Neil Browne or Mr. LORIMER. He did not find it. He admits before the committee that at the time he undertook to blackmail WILLIAM LORIMER he had received no offer for the manuscript, but that he hoped to receive a reply from Mr. LORIMER that would be of advantage to him.

White says over and over again that he had no evidence of any character against Senator LORIMER, and had no dealings with him. He testified before the first investigating committee that if Senator LORIMER had met his demands and had paid him $75,000 he would have surrendered the manuscript to him then, and thus admitted that it was a blackmailing proposition.

The case against Mr. LORIMER stands on the testimony alone of that blackmailer. There you have a picture of the only man who claims or admits bribery in connection with the election of Mr. LORIMER, and should the Senate adopt the testimony of Charles A. White and deprive Senator LORIMER of his seat in this body, that day will mark the greatest act of injustice, in my judgment, that has ever been recorded in any parallel case.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] in his argument the other day, in an effort to find something good to say of Mr.

White, in the kindness of heart which prompts him in everything he does, spoke of the pleasant correspondence that had passed between Lee O'Neil Browne and Mr. White during the months of July, August, and September, 1909, during which time White was secretly concocting his "jack pot story," when, it is true, he was writing Mr. Browne affectionate letters telling him that he was without funds; letters in which White represented himself to be in such dire need that he was unable to get clothes which he had ordered from the tailor; letters in which he appealed to Mr. LORIMER to intercede for him and help him to secure some sort of position in the Government Secret Service, or anything that would place him on his feet again and relieve him from his distressing situation; letters to Mr. Browne of the same character which led to efforts on the part of Mr. LORIMER to get some kind of employment for him. But all these were written while he was concocting the plot, and preparing this story against Lee O'Neil Browne and against Mr. LORIMER.

Were these the letters of a friend? Were they honest? What does he say in his testimony about them? I want the Senate to understand who and what this man White is. I want Senators to note the quality of his character and how easily he substitutes craft for conscience in all his dealings with men.

Note the following examination:

Why did you write the letters to Lee O'Neil Browne and to Senator LORIMER about those jobs?

Mr. WHITE. I thought possibly they would answer them in some way, and possibly make some admission that they were under no obligation to me. Senator LORIMER did that, in a way, by not answering my letter.

Mr. HANECY. That is, you wanted to trap or trick one or both of the parties—Lee O'Neil Browne, your friend, or Senator LORIMER—into some admission that you could use in connection with your story that you afterwards sold to the Chicago Tribune, and that you are now trying to have published. Is that right?

* * * * * * *

Mr. WHITE. Yes; I was writing the letters for the purpose of getting replies that could be used.

Again:

Mr. HANECY. So that you used the subterfuges and the lies included in those letters to trick or trap Lee O'Neil Browne and Senator LORIMER into admissions that they would not have made if it were not for the matters that you stated in your letters. Is that the fact?

Mr. WHITE. Substantially so.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HANECY. So that the statements in the letters that you wrote to Lee O'Neil Browne, asking him to try and get a Federal job or some other job for you, were falsehoods, were they?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; from a——

Mr. HANECY. They were lies, pure and simple, and known to be such by you when you put them into the letters and sent them to Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne and Mr. LORIMER?

Mr. WHITE. Practically so.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HANECY. And when you wrote the letter to Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne and asked for a loan—the letter in which you said that you owed a tailor's bill of $85—that statement was a falsehood, a pure Anglo-Saxon lie, and known to be such by you at the time that you wrote it and sent it to Mr. Browne, was it not?

Mr. WHITE. It was not true; yes.

Mr. HANECY. It was a lie, was it not?

Mr. WHITE. I said it was not true.

Mr. HANECY. Did you need the money at the time that you asked Browne for it?

Mr. WHITE. Why, I do not say that I needed it at that time.

Mr. HANECY. Did you?

Mr. WHITE. I do not remember just exactly what my financial resources were at that time.

Mr. HANECY. You got the money, did you not, that you asked Browne for in that letter?

Mr. WHITE. I got the money.

Mr. HANECY. So that your letter, the statements in which you say now were pure and simple lies for the purpose of tricking or trapping Lee O'Neil Browne, your professed friend, and for whom you professed the greatest friendship, had a double purpose—both to trick Browne into an admission that you could use in the story that you sold to the Tribune, and are now about to publish, and the further purpose of getting money from Browne? Is that right?

Mr. WHITE. I will answer that "yes."

I could go on reading that class of testimony, showing that the letters White wrote to Browne professing friendship and the letters to Mr. LORIMER asking for political aid were all written either for the purpose of getting money, which he did get, or for the purpose of trying to trap them into something that he could use against them, because he admits that he had nothing against Mr. LORIMER. Yet Senators are asked on the uncorroborated testimony of that man, self-confessed perjurer and liar, to say that their fellow Member shall not have a seat in this body!

THE DISPOSITION WHITE MADE OF HIS STORY.

Now, Mr. President, we come to an interesting stage in the history of this case. We have reached the point where Mr. Charles A. White had prepared his story and had failed utterly to secure money either by its sale to Everybody's or Doubleday, Page & Co., or from Senator LORIMER through his attempted blackmail, and where he had failed in any way to accomplish his avowed purpose. The testimony shows that he conferred with labor leaders, among them Mr. Edwin R. Wright, president of the Illinois Federation of Labor and member of employers' liability commission, by appointment of Gov. Deneen, who suggested the Chicago Tribune, and as a result, eventually, White went to the Tribune office in Chicago to dispose of his jack-pot story. Up to that time that story never had been called anything but the "jack-pot" story, and it is so described in the receipt given for it by Mr. Keeley on March 11, 1910.

Why did he go to the Tribune? He was sent there by Mr. Wright, according to the testimony, and he reached the right place. The truth is—there is no denial of it in the evidence anywhere—that the policy of the Tribune for 20 years had been antagonistic to Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Keeley does not disguise the fact that if at any time he could have found anything which he could use to drive Mr. LORIMER out of the politics of Illinois he would have been very glad to do it. He looks upon anything that could be used for that purpose, like the story of White, as merchandise which he has a perfect right to purchase and a perfect right to use.

The salient features of the White story were:

First. That there had been a legislative jack pot from which he had received $900.

Second. That on May 24, 1909, two days before the election of Mr. LORIMER, Lee O'Neil Browne had bribed him to vote for Mr. LORIMER, agreeing to pay him $1,000 therefor.

When Mr. White went to him on that occasion and told him the nature of the manuscript, Keeley would not talk with him about it unless he could see it himself. As he expressed it, he was not going to buy a pig in a poke.

THE TRIBUNE AN ENEMY TO MR. LORIMER.

The attitude of the Tribune toward Mr. LORIMER, and the value of the story to the Tribune, is shown by the fact that they actually paid $3,500 for it. They later paid $700 for what is known as the "Glavis story," where they got the bad end of the bargain and secured nothing, but which they hoped would serve the same end.

They expended in and about this prosecution, to secure the unseating of Senator LORIMER, the further sum of $20,000 in round numbers, making the amount expended by the Tribune up to the time of the reopening of the case in the Senate over $24,000.

It appears that White first went to the Tribune office on the 4th of March. He did not have the manuscript with him, but on the 11th of March he returned with it and submitted it to Mr. Keeley, and Mr. Keeley took it and gave him a receipt, which provided that it should not be used except with Mr. White's consent. Mr. Keeley read the article and observed its general nature. He wanted an adviser. Gov. Deneen, as I have already pointed out, had previous to that time gone over to the "newspaper crowd"—so called—in Chicago, and he had become the close personal friend of Mr. Keeley. Mr. Keeley telephoned him at Springfield that he wanted to see him. Mr. Deneen promptly responded, and went to Chicago on the 16th of March, only five days after this article came into the possession of Mr. Keeley, and a conference was held between them at the La Salle Hotel. The relations which existed between them at that time politically were very close and intimate.

GOV. DENEEN ALSO MR. LORIMER'S POLITICAL ENEMY.

The history of Gov. Deneen, so far as his relations to Mr. LORIMER are concerned, was sketched early in this discussion, and I will only recall the fact that friendly relations having been reestablished between them early in January and Gov. Deneen having strongly urged him to become a candidate, Mr. LORIMER believed that Gov. Deneen was supporting him until the Sunday before the Wednesday upon which he was elected. But it now appears, and Gov. Deneen so testified, that he never had intended to support him, and that he did actively oppose him; that he did what he could to prevent any man voting for him for Senator when he found that his name had been suggested and he was coming prominently before that legislature. Subsequent to that time a further contention had arisen between Gov. Deneen and Senator LORIMER. I have already mentioned Senator LORIMER's efforts to secure the adoption of legislation for the establishment of a deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico and to secure the adoption of the constitutional amendment which authorized the State of Illinois to make an appropriation of $20,000,000 for that purpose. But as soon as that was accomplished a difference of opinion arose between Senator LORIMER and Gov. Deneen as to the manner of the expenditure of that money. Gov. Deneen's testimony, briefly stated, indicates that he wanted to proceed at once without waiting for cooperation on the part of the Federal Government. Senator LORIMER believed that if the expenditure of that $20,000,000 was begun in Illinois without a corresponding appropriation on the part of the Government the money would be wasted. And he further insisted that faith should be kept with the people, because it was distinctly stated from every platform during the campaign for the adoption of the constitutional amendment providing for the $20,000,000 bonds that not one penny of it would be expended until Federal cooperation and an appropriation had been secured, thus insuring the success of the great undertaking.

Moreover, there was still a greater reason for the position of Mr. LORIMER. It was that the water flowing into that canal from Lake Michigan was completely under the control of the Federal Government, and the State of Illinois could have nothing whatever to do with it. Every ounce of water flowing through there to-day in the drainage canal is by consent of the War Department.

Gov. Deneen proposed legislation which would allow him to build three dams, the first, to cost $5,000,000, to be in operation before the others. That was put in the form of legislation. Mr. LORIMER opposed it. He opposed independent action. He wanted a 14-foot waterway all the way through to the Gulf, something that would be of real advantage to the great central West, as well as the termini, and he urged the fact that the State had no power to divert the water from the lake, and that those operating the canal were using the water subject to a revocable permit He went so far as to try to compromise with Gov. Deneen upon the proposition, and stated to him before leaving Chicago that he was authorized to say to the members of the general assembly who held the same views that he (LORIMER) held on the subject that if he (Deneen) would agree to a provision that no money except what was necessary for plans and specifications should be expended until the Federal Government made an appropriation and adopted the plan, he would be willing to have the bill passed substantially as it was passed by the senate; that is, providing that the governor should have all the power of appointing the board and be unhampered in any sense of the word in the expenditure of the money. The governor would not agree to that. He wanted to have the bill passed without any strings tied to it. That is the way he expressed it, according to Mr. LORIMER's testimony.

I have called attention to the political enmity of the Chicago Tribune and those who control it and that of Gov. Deneen to Mr. LORIMER, because I purpose, as I proceed with the narration of events, to connect other enemies of Mr. LORIMER with them in a strong combined effort to turn the White story to the disadvantage of Mr. LORIMER and to secure his retirement from the United States Senate, and to this end to bring about the conviction of Lee O'Neil Browne under the charge of having bribed White to vote for Mr. LORIMER for United States Senator.

THE USE TO WHICH WHITE'S STORY WAS TO BE PUT.

Gov. Deneen went to Chicago at that time and consulted with Mr. Keeley about what use to make of the story which had been submitted by Charles A. White and they had their meeting at a hotel. It is a significant fact that the first question Mr. Keeley asked the governor was in which county, Cook or Sangamon, a prosecution against Browne could be had. What good would it be to him unless carried on in Chicago, where it would be of special benefit to the Tribune? He wanted that prosecution in Chicago and nowhere else, and that is the point concerning which he particularly consulted the governor. Mr. Wayman, the State's attorney for Cook County, in his testimony referring to that, says:

> He told me that he had asked Gov. Deneen where the venue lay, and what the governor's answer was I do not remember. He told me that he had had a talk with the governor about the story, its truthfulness, and the venue, and I do not recall the opinion the governor gave him as to where the venue lay.

Now, that was at the interview to which I have referred, wherein Mr. Keeley told Gov. Deneen the character of this story; he told him it was a general exposure of the jack pot, saying that it was a jack pot that was in the control of the leaders, that the men who followed the leaders never got any pay for any specific thing they did in the way of general legislation, but they trusted their leaders and got something in the end.

Now, hurrying over the progress of events, the Tribune employed Mr. Austrian, a prominent attorney in Chicago, who had copies of the White story made, and March 23, two days later, they employed Mr. McGuire, the head of a great detective agency, and began paying his expenses on that date. They put Mr. White under his direction and they furnished Mr. White money on which to live while they were investigating his story.

April 1 Mr. McGuire arranged a meeting between Mr. Wayman, the State's attorney, and Mr. Keeley, at McGuire's office, at which time Mr. Keeley told Mr. Wayman that he had White's jack-pot story; that it would require a prosecution and wanted to know where the venue would lie. Keeley was anxious about the venue. It was his first inquiry of Gov. Deneen, and his first question of Mr. Wayman. To his mind it was not as important that a prosecution should be had, as that it should be had in Cook County. Mr. Wayman told him he would have to see the witness and know details of the story before deciding, and the following morning Mr. Keeley sent to him the manuscript.

The result of that interview must convince every candid mind that the purposes entertained by Mr. Keeley at that time were to build up the Tribune through the exploitation of the White story, and at the same time, if possible, destroy Mr. LORIMER's political influence and deprive him of the possession of his seat in the Senate.

Anyone would naturally think that these patriots, learning from that story that there had been general corruption in the legislature and that jack pots had existed, would have united in a strong movement to convict every guilty man, whether a contributor to or receiver of a corrupt fund. That an effort at least would have been made to punish the offenders and drive them out of public life. Not a thing of that kind was done, and not a man has been prosecuted either in Cook County or Sangamon County for complicity in the jack-pot fund either as contributor or receiver. Not a man who confessed to receiving money from such a fund has ever been brought to trial, but, on the other hand, every man who had anything out of that jack-pot fund has been given full immunity, and all of them, although self-confessed participators, walk the streets to-day perfectly free men.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator suggests that nobody has ever investigated the jack pot. If I recall aright one of the express directions to the Senate committee of which the Senator was chairman was to investigate the jack pot.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If the Senator had listened a little more carefully he would have understood that I was talking about the Ilinois authorities and the Illinois courts, not the Senate.

Mr. REED. I understand that qualification, but the Senator himself, I take it, undertook to investigate the origin of the jack pot. Was he successful in ascertaining it?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator was not, but had the Senator been a State official of Illinois at that time instead of giving immunity to everyone connected with the jack-pot fund, for the sake of securing evidence against this one man, Lee O'Neil Browne, on another charge, he would have tried to discover some adequate means for dealing properly and effectively with these jack-potters, to whom immunity was granted.

Mr. REED. The purpose of my inquiry was this. If the Senate committee, in the light that was developed by the legislative committee of Illinois, by the grand jury, and by all the numerous investigations to aid the Senate committee, was unable to get at the source of the jack pot, does the Senator think it is exactly fair to criticize the officials of Illinois because they were equally unable to get at the source of the jack pot?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator can judge for himself whether or not it is fair for me to take the position I have. I do not care to enter into that discussion. I take the position that the authorities of Illinois did not attempt it; instead of that they prevented it by asking from the courts immunity for every man who was suspected of getting money from the jack pot and did get it; they did it in an effort to find some kind of testimony that would support Charles A White's story against Lee O'Neil Browne, which they failed to secure. And although the case was tried in the courts of Illinois—twice tried—Lee O'Neil Browne was acquitted of the charge of having bribed White to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER. Whether Browne did so bribe White is the precise question that is now before the Senate. Do not overlook the fact that it has been twice tried before a jury in Illinois, tried in a legally constituted court, and on legal evidence; and that Browne has been acquitted of the charge. Surely this Senate ought to take cognizance of that fact and be governed by it.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. LORIMER. And does not the record further show that through the efforts of Gov. Deneen and the Chicago Tribune the attorney general of the State of Illinois tried to prevent the State's attorney of Sangamon County from inquiring into whether or not corruption did occur in the Legislature of Illinois?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator's mind, as usual, works more rapidly than mine; but I am coming soon to that point.

When Mr. Keeley and Mr. Wayman were discussing the question whether or not there was anything in the White story, it will be seen that it was aimed at Senator LORIMER, not at corruption in the Illinois Legislature. Mr. Wayman testifies:

We went into a discussion of the entire matter. I told Mr. Keeley that I had been through one bribery case and that they were very difficult cases; that I did not want to undertake another one unless it was founded on pretty substantial evidence; that such a case as that would involve a great many people; that it was a very important matter and would have to be gone into very carefully. I told him that the prosecution of the case would call in an array against the prosecution of the resources not only of the men who were implicated in the crime, but the resources of all those who were beneficiaries of the alleged crime; that the political situation here was such—the division in opinion of people in Cook County was such—that it would be impossible to draw a jury to try such a case without having on the jury some partisans of Mr. LORIMER.

Why? Because the prosecution was directed against Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. Wayman further testified:

I called attention to the fact that Mr. LORIMER's partisans, of course, would fight the prosecution; that whether or not he knew of the bribery he would have to fight the case.

And that is the answer to the inquiry made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] this morning in relation to Mr. LORIMER lending Mr. Browne money. The State's attorney told Mr. Keeley at the outset that that would be the logical and natural result of it. How could it be otherwise when the fight was against Mr. LORIMER? Let me read that again—and I called attention to the fact that Mr. LORIMER'S partisans, of course, would fight the prosecution; that, whether or not he knew of the bribery, he would have to fight the case.

I also called his attention to the fact that it would be a very expensive proposition to undertake to investigate. Mr. Keeley said that the Tribune would be willing to pay the expenses of the investigation, that he was going to investigate it, and he was going to print the story. I told him that Cook County was not a pauper and any investigation undertaken by my office would be paid for by Cook County in the usual way.

I am not criticizing Mr. Keeley. He was a frank witness. I liked what seemed to me sometimes to be his almost brutal frankness. He did not attempt to dodge the responsibility of the fight that he had inaugurated against Senator LORIMER; he admitted it, and he admitted that he took every means possible to get information that could be used in that direction. When he had finished his testimony I admired the man because of his frankness in stating precisely his purpose, and it was not for me to judge of his motives. When I knew his purpose from his own lips, that was sufficient. From his newspaper standpoint, he wanted a newspaper scoop, as I will show by and by; and he particularly wanted to do all that could be done in any way to carry out his declared purpose to drive Mr. LORIMER out of politics in Chicago and the State of Illinois.

THE STATE'S ATTORNEY'S VALUATION OF WHITE'S STORY.

Mr. Wayman further testified:

I said, further, "You are buying the story and that fact will impair its value worse than any other feature of the entire matter."

That is to say, in a court of law.

Why should not that judgment prevail in the Senate of the United States, as it did prevail in the courts of law in Illinois? Further, Mr. Wayman says:

I arbitrarily fixed percentages on it. I said, "His being an accomplice will discount it some 50 per cent. You buying the story will discount it 30 per cent, and a prosecution with White as a witness will put the State to the test of a 20 per cent witness."

Now, I ask Senators who are wavering in their opinions in regard to this case and who are weighing the testimony of Charles A. White, to accept the judgment of the State's attorney of Cook County, Ill., who knew White, who had studied his story, and who knew the circumstances under which it had been obtained, and who stated that they were embarking upon a prosecution with a 20 per cent witness. Even under such circumstances the Tribune was bound to push its purpose.

Mr. Wayman further testified as follows:

I said, "That being true, a careful investigation must be made. It is an expensive thing, too." He said, "The Tribune will bear the expense of the investigation." I said, "Cook County is not a pauper; not a dollar of private funds has been contributed to the office since I have been there, and I will not make an exception in this case. As soon as I exhaust the appropriation now there I will call on the county board for further appropriation."

Now, mark this:

I said to Mr. Keeley, "You must understand if I take hold of this, I am captain of the ship." He said, "Yes; but I am running a newspaper and I am going to print the news." I said, "Do you often purchase stories?" He replied, "Yes; news is merchandise." I asked him when the story was written. One other thing. I forgot this. I said, "This story coming to me through the Tribune will also affect the credibility of White." I said, "Taking the whole thing, it could not come to the State in a worse situation."

But Mr. Keeley insisted, and the agreement was entered into between the State's attorney and the editor of the Tribune.

Mr. Keeley agreed to all that, but said that the matter was in his hands and he proposed to investigate the story and print it. I told him to send the story to my office, that I would read it, take the matter under consideration, with the express understanding that if I undertook the investigation he would not print anything about it or hint at any thing about it, because if he printed it it would impair the investigation—that it would have to be carried on without any publicity.

He then made the remark, "I am running a newspaper." I said, "Yes; and I am running the State's attorney's office." I said, "If I undertake this investigation I will be willing that you have the exclusive news value of the story." He said, "That is all I want." I said, "I will give you notice of whatever my opinion is, and if I do not prosecute it I will announce that fact to you, and if I do prosecute it I will announce that fact to you before anybody else knows it." That was satisfactory. I think probably there was some other conversation there that I do not recall now.

Mr. MARBLE. What was the conclusion reached?

Mr. WAYMAN. The conclusion reached was that he was to send the story to my office. The following morning the story was sent to my office.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HANECY. You sat down together and after you had talked it over you agreed that you would give him a "scoop," after you had examined into it—that is, you would give him the right to publish it first—and he agreed that he would not publish any part of it until you had investigated it?

Mr. WAYMAN. That is practically a correct statement.

Mr. HANECY. And you kept your agreement with him and did not let anybody else have a "scoop" on the story?

Mr. WAYMAN. That is true.

These are the conditions under which this story went into the hand of the State's attorney. A criminal prosecution was commenced against Lee O'Neil Browne under this bargain between the State's attorney and the manager of the Tribune, that one should be the captain of the ship and prosecution, and that the other should have the "scoop" and use it as a newspaper sensation. The story had not been purchased at the time the bargain was made. Mr. White had been sent, accompanied by detectives and agents of the Tribune, through the State to interview Shephard, Link, Beckemeyer, and Clark, in an attempt to get them to say that they had received money from Wilson at St. Louis on the 15th day of July. In the meantime, the State's attorney had examined the question of venue, and had finally determined upon the one fact that Browne had paid $850 to White in Chicago; that he could bring the prosecution in Cook County, as Mr. Keeley desired.

THE TRIBUNE KNEW WHITE'S CHARACTER.

On the night of April 28, 1910, White was in St. Louis, and in company with two friends spent the time until after midnight in and about the buffet of the Royal Hotel, drinking heavily. Between 1 and 2 o'clock on the morning of April 29, White and these friends appeared at the European Hotel in East St. Louis very drunk and wholly without money. Being refused lodging, White was permitted the use of the telephone and he called up Detective Turner who with Mr. Phillips, a Tribune representative, was at St. Louis. He told Turner he was "broke" and wanted money, and Turner instructed the night clerk to give him accommodations, which the clerk refused to do. White was then permitted to call the Tribune office in Chicago, and held a telephonic conversation with Mr. Hammer, secretary to Manager Keeley, in which he said:

"This is Charles A. White; I am here at East St. Louis, and I am getting the wrong end of the deal, and I am not going to stand for it." That he had two friends with him and could not get a night's lodging; that he was "broke, while Turner is living on the fat of the land with Phillips at St. Louis now. I want some money, and I want it damned quick, or I won't go through for you. You need not think I am a sucker. You tell this hotel man here who I am and my connection with you, and that you will stand for anything I want and will pay for it, or else I will write a denial of the whole damn thing."

Mr. Hammer then requested the clerk, Mr. Ellerhof, to give White lodgings, saying he would pay the bill; but the clerk said he was under instructions from the proprietor of the hotel to give no one accommodations under such circumstances, and positively refused to comply with this request. The Tribune man then asked the clerk to call White back to the telephone, and renewing the conversation with Mr. Hammer, White repeated that he was "broke," and referring to the story which he had submitted to the Tribune said "he would not go through with it. If he did not get settled up by Monday morning he would not go through with it."

There is a picture of this man White less than 24 hours before the Tribune purchased his story. He was drunk. Without money, but boastful and insolently threatening the Tribune people with a denial of the whole story which he had submitted unless he was taken care of and "settled up" with by Monday morning, and this was on Friday.

It can not be denied that the Tribune manager had full knowledge of White's dissolute habits, despicable character, and evident contemptible purpose. Whether the Tribune people were influenced by this threat of White does not appear in the evidence, except by the fact, which is significant, that on the evening of this same 29th day of April, 1910, White had reached Chicago, and his contract of sale to the Tribune was signed and delivered, the consideration therefore being the payment to him of $3,500, of which $1,250 was paid at that time. The controlling influence of his greed and avarice, and the wickedness of his intention is indicated by the fact, as Manager Keeley testified, that in the first instance he demanded $50,000 for his jack-pot story, which offer was spurned as ridiculous. At the time of the signing of the contract White expressed a willingness to take $4,000, and finally, after much parleying $3,500 was agreed upon and the deal was consummated.

When the Tribune managers purchased that story from White they did so with full knowledge of the character of its author; they had been advised by State's Attorney Wayman that, for reasons stated by him, White at best would only be a 20 per cent witness, and yet the Tribune paid $3,500 for this man's uncorroborated story, upon which rests the entire weight of the movement to unseat Senator LORIMER, and in the execution of this plan to unseat Senator LORIMER the alleged bribery of White by Lee O'Neil Browne was the only ground upon which it could be successfully prosecuted. At this time the manager of the Tribune had brought into the movement Gov. Deneen, as already shown, and State's Attorney Wayman, with all the powerful machinery of the legal department of Cook County, was strongly cooperating.

Friday, July 29, 1910, was a very important day in the history of this case. On that day Mr. Wayman called the grand jury to meet in Chicago the following Monday, May 2, and notified Mr. Keeley through his attorney, Alfred Austrian, that the Tribune might go ahead and publish anything it pleased concerning the White story. Austrian lost no time in communicating with Keeley, who was at his farm at Wheaton, and the latter immediately returned to Chicago, went to the Tribune office, where he held a conference with Mr. Austrian and Detective McGuire, after which White was brought in by McGuire, and then and there the contract was entered into for the sale and purchase of the White story.

What was that contract between the Tribune and Charles A. White? It is as follows:

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE, OFFICE OF PUBLISHER,
Chicago, Ill., April 29, 1910.

To CHARLES A. WHITE:

You offered to sell to us for publication a story written by you, which story gives your experience while a member of the House of Representatives of Illinois during 1909–10, and giving also certain information as to what transpired by reason of your voting for certain measures, etc., while a member of such house.

We refused to pay you for that story or to print the same unless such story was verified and corroborated by persons selected by the Tribune.

For more than four weeks we, with your cooperation, through different agencies, have caused your story to be fully investigated.

For the sole and exclusive right hereby granted by you to the Tribune Co. to publish this story, or a revision thereof, or excerpts therefrom, in the Chicago Tribune and copyright it either in your name or in that of the Tribune Co., but in which shall be at our election, and also in full compensation for the time already spent by you in assisting us in obtaining corroborative evidence of the facts contained in this story and in full payment for all your time which shall be devoted by you to further substantiate this story at any time, which time you hereby agree to devote to that purpose as and when called upon so to do, the Tribune Co. hereby agrees to pay you $3,250, of which said sum $1,250 shall be paid upon the printing of the said story or the first installment thereof, $1,000 30 days after said first payment, and $1,000 60 days thereafter.

You reserve to yourself all book or other rights to the story other than the exclusive newspaper rights hereinbefore referred to, which belong under the terms hereof to the Tribune Co.

J. KEELEY,
Vice President Tribune Co.

CHICAGO, ILL., April —, 1910.

To the Chicago Tribune and the Tribune Co.

GENTLEMEN: I have read the above and foregoing and agree to the terms thereof and to accept the sums of money as therein set forth, and I further agree to devote my time and services to substantiate the story referred to as and when requested by you so to do and in such manner as you may direct.

CHARLES A. WHITE.

Note the agreement upon the part of White:

I have read the above and foregoing, and agree to the terms thereof and to accept the sums of money as therein set forth, and I further agree to devote my time and services to substantiate the story referred to as and when requested by you so to do and in such manner as you may direct.

Another peculiar circumstance in connection with this transaction, and one worthy of consideration by the Senate, is the fact that immediately after White entered into and signed the foregoing contract and agreement, before he moved from the Tribune office, he was placed in the custody of an officer of the State's attorney's office; that he willingly submitted to this extraordinary procedure, and remained in the charge of Cook County officers, wholly under their control, for a period of eight months.

During that entire time, sleeping or waking, in court or out of court, Charles A. White never took a step or a breath except in the presence of an officer of Cook County. He testified before the Cook County grand jury; he testified in the first trial of Lee O'Neil Browne; he testified in the second trial of Lee O'Neil Browne in August and early in September, and he testified before the Burrows committee. Then it seemed that the whole work of the prosecution had ended and that he had completed his contract, but, notwithstanding that, Cook County continued to keep Charles A. White in the custody of an officer during October, November, and December, and until after the Burrows committee made its report to the Senate on December 21, 1910. Two days after that report was made to the Senate Cook county released its hold upon White, and during that eight months all of his expenses and the expenses of the officers attending him, amounting to $2,531.15, were paid by the county of Cook. There was some reason for this.

THE MOVEMENT TO UNSEAT MR. LORIMER IS LAUNCHED.

Going back to the evening of Friday, April 29, 1910, following the purchase of the White story, great excitement prevailed in the Tribune office; all the machinery of that immense plant was called into action to insure its publication the following morning, and on Saturday morning, April 30, 1910, the Tribune, under glaring headlines, printed the story, accompanied by an interview with Gov. Deneen. The governor was in Chicago that night, and in view of what has been said in Illinois and in Washington concerning bipartisanship combinations in Illinois politics, it is interesting to note in passing that Gov. Deneen testified that he had attended a political conference that evening with Roger Sullivan, Democratic national committeeman from Illinois, and others, relating to "the proposed apportionment" of the city of Chicago, in order to determine whether the Democrats and Republicans could agree. So that, if bipartisanship has flourished in Illinois politics, it has not been confined exclusively to the Illinois Legislature in the election of Senator LORIMER.

This publication was made, as I have said, in the Tribune on Saturday, April 30. Other papers took the matter up, and were filled with startling announcements. Excitement ran high throughout the State and Nation. Sunday, May 1, was a busy day. Everyone in political life in Chicago who was opposed to Mr. LORIMER was roused to action. When he was elected Senator they feared his increased influence. Now he was attacked and his downfall predicted, and they were ready to renew the old contest against him.

APPEARANCE OF INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO.

At this juncture of affairs the International Harvester Co., through it general manager, Clarence S. Funk, makes its appearance as a new element in the combination to drag Mr. LORIMER from his seat in the Senate.

Why did Mr. Funk inject himself into the matter on that day? Why do I say he rushed in? Why did he do so? Let us look at the situation for a moment. For years before Mr. LORIMER's election to the United States Senate the International Harvester Co. had been his political enemy. With his election to the upper House of the Congress he became a more potential power. It was then time to make peace with him. A meeting had taken place on the day following his election, May 27, 1909, at the Union League Club, Chicago, between Mr. Funk, the general manager of the International Harvester Co., and Edward Hines. They disagree as to what occurred on that occasion. Mr. Hines's version is corroborated in every particular. Three witnesses—Hall, Baker, and Carney—who were all present, corroborate Mr. Hines's statement as to the opening portion of the interview.

VERSION OF MR. HINES.

Briefly stated, Mr. Hines says that Mr. Funk approached him and said:

I am very glad to hear that Mr. LORIMER has been elected Senator.

And further said:

I would like very much indeed, at your earliest convenience, if you would arrange to introduce me to Senator LORIMER. I have never met him, and I would like to have you introduce me to him.

And as they were about to separate Mr. Funk further said:

The Senator must have been put to more or less expense in this contest for the senatorship, and he ought not to stand that. The business interests ought to take it off his hands. We would like to contribute to that expense.

Mr. Hines testified:

I said to him that I did not know anything about the matter; but I said, "I will see and let you know."

The evidence shows that Mr. Hines did call upon Mr. LORIMER at his home the following Sunday evening; that he inquired concerning his expenses; was told by Mr. LORIMER that he had incurred no expenses save his railroad fare; and Mr. Hines reported to Mr. Funk that Mr. LORIMER had been to no expense whatever. Mr. Hines testified that his impression was that Mr. Funk approached him in that way for the purpose of "currying favor," as he expressed it, with Senator LORIMER, toward whom he had been opposed, but with whom, now that he had been elevated to the senatorship, he desired to be upon better terms.

That Hines's version of that interview is correct is made evident by the surrounding circumstances. He says that at the time he had his interview with Senator LORIMER he told him that Mr. Funk was very anxious to be introduced to him, and that Mr. LORIMER replied, "Mr. Funk is one of my active enemies, Mr. Hines, and I do not care to meet him particularly." But after some discussion and Mr. Hines's statement that he had promised to present him, Senator LORIMER consented to meet Mr. Funk. The evidence shows that Mr. Hines was unable to see Mr. Funk personally after his talk with Senator LORIMER, because he left Chicago early on the Monday following, but he sent word to him through Mr. Wiehe that there was nothing to that matter—meaning Senator LORIMER's expenses in connection with his election. During that week Mr. Wiehe had occasion to communicate by long distance with Mr. Hines, at Washington, and in the course of the conversation told him that his message did not seem to suit Mr. Funk, who was anxious to meet him in Washington the following Saturday. Mr. Hines could not tell about his movements at that time, and the following Friday, June 4, 1909, he telegraphed to the Edward Hines Lumber Co. at Chicago:

Will try. Have Funk meet me, Chicago, Saturday or Sunday. Could meet him any time. Like to leave here to-day. Answer quick.

What does that telegram mean? It means that Funk desired to see him, and Hines would try to meet him.

Mr. Hines received a telegram in reply, stating:

Funk New York to-day. Leaves this afternoon, Washington. There to-morrow. You can reach him to-day, George Perkins's office, or Judge Gary, 51 Broadway.

This incident is corroborated by the testimony of Mr. Wiehe.

Without waiting to meet Mr. Funk in Washington, Mr. Hines left for Chicago that afternoon. He testified that he had no business of a personal nature pending with Mr. Funk, and that he knew of no reason why the latter desired to meet him beyond what was expressed in the message of Mr. Wiehe to the effect that Mr. Funk did not seem satisfied with what he had said to him and wanted to see Mr. Hines personally.

The statement of Mr. Hines is further corroborated by the fact that during the deep-waterways convention which was held in Washington in the fall of 1909, Mr. Funk met him in the New Willard Hotel and was taken by Mr. Hines to a room upstairs and introduced to Mr. LORIMER, as he had then and previously requested.

If the version of Mr. Hines is not true, why was Mr. Funk pursuing him the next week seeking an interview with him? Why did he want to meet him in Washington? As the evidence shows, there was no reason for it and no explanation of it except for the purpose of carrying out his determination to establish, if possible, friendly relations with Senator LORIMER. Months later why was Mr. Funk renewing his request to be introduced to Senator LORIMER, and why did he go with Edward Hines to his apartments in the Willard Hotel for the sole purpose of being presented to Senator LORIMER?

CHANGED CONDITIONS.

But now conditions have changed! A year has elapsed. With the publication of White's jack-pot story and the charge that Senator LORIMER occupied his position in the Senate as the result of bribery in the legislature all the old opposing forces in politics immediately sprung into new life; they all joined in organizing a crusade to drive this man out of the Senate of the United States, and Clarence S. Funk evidently wished to add his contribution to the swelling tide of opposition to Mr. LORIMER.

Immediately after the publication of the White story, being anxious to enter the lists of those planning the downfall of Senator LORIMER, Mr. Funk sought out his intimate friend Mr. H. H. Kohlsaat, of the Record-Herald, who for 20 years had been confessedly bitterly opposed to Mr. LORIMER politically, and to him, under a solemn pledge of secrecy, unfolded his version of the interview had with Edward Hines on May 27, 1909, the day following the election of Senator LORIMER.

VERSION OF MR. FUNK.

Mr. Funk gave to this committee his version of the interview had with Edward Hines on the day after the election of Mr. LORIMER, testifying that Mr. Hines approached him and said: "Hello! you are just the man I was looking for." That Hines seemed to be feeling exuberated, and further said, "Well, we put LORIMER over down at Springfield, but it cost us $100,000 to do it." That he "then went on to explain that they had to act quickly when the time came and did not have any time to consult anybody." And that he further said: "So we put up the money. Now we are seeing some of our friends to get the matter fixed up." That he inquired how much he was getting from different friends, and Hines said, "Well, we can only go to a few big people; but if about 10 of us would put up $10,000 apiece we would clean it up." That he asked Hines why he had come to him, and Hines said, "Because you are as much interested as anybody in having the right kind of a man in Washington." That he replied, "I told him we would not have anything to do with the matter." That he wanted to know why, and he said, "Because we are not in that kind of business."

Mr. Funk said Mr. Hines mentioned Mr. Tilden's name as the man who handled the money.

In doing this Mr. Funk fully intended, without permitting the story to reach any judicial tribunal where its truth or falsity could be determined, to have it used, as it was used, as it has been used from that hour to this, secretly but effectively to bring about the destruction of Senator LORIMER politically. And it was upon Mr. Funk's version of this interview with Edward Hines that the Senate of the United States reopened this case, and that is the sole basis for the claim that a corruption fund was raised and used to secure the election of Senator LORIMER.

MR. KOHLSAAT BECOMES A PARTY TO THE MOVEMENT.

Mr. Kohlsaat is a man of great ability; he has great interests; and he has done great newspaper work in Chicago. He is a charming man to meet. He came into this controversy just as James Keeley did; just as Gov. Deneen did; and just as other men engaged in politics did—to unseat Senator LORIMER. Their whole stock in trade was the jack-pot story of Charles A. White, unless it should appear that a corruption fund had been raised and used corruptly by Edward Hines to aid in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER. As a matter of fact, there was no such fund; there is not a shred of evidence to support the statement that such a fund ever existed. And yet this story of Funk, secretly circulated, which never until now was allowed to reach any tribunal where its truth or falsity could be tested, has, more than any other one element in this case, resulted in the great wave of public sentiment which has demanded Mr. LORIMER as a sacrifice.

This is the story which Mr. Funk told Mr. Kohlsaat at this time, when it became necessary, as he believed, to join this movement to oust Senator LORIMER from his seat; he says he had never told it to any person except Mr. McCormick and Mr. Bancroft, the president and the counsel for the company of which he was general manager. Both of these men say they never mentioned it to any person, and had not even discussed it among themselves, so that is was locked up in the mind of Mr. Funk until he told it to Mr. Kohlsaat, and Mr. Kohlsaat says that he told it to Mr. Keeley, of the Chicago Tribune, and to Mr. Lawson, of the Chicago Daily News, "in confidence," giving to the latter Funk's name.

Now mark the time: Monday morning, May 2, the very day that the grand jury convened in Chicago, the Tribune published an editorial headed, "Was it sawdust?" followed by "Who furnished the dust, to use a colloquialism, to bribe the legislature?" And Mr. Keeley testifies that he personally wrote that editorial and ordered it to be published as the leading editorial in the Chicago Tribune of May 2:

Mr. HANECY. When you published the leading editorial in the Tribune, which you say you wrote yourself——
Mr. KEELEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. On the 2d of May—the one headed, "Who furnished the sawdust"—you meant in that editorial Edward Hines, didn't you?
Mr. KEELEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. And you wanted the public to understand that you meant Edward Hines, didn't you?
Mr. KEELEY. They could draw that inference; yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. You wanted them to draw that inference?
Mr. KEELEY. Why, possibly; yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. Edward Hines is the only one that your paper mentioned as a lumberman or in connection with sawdust in any of the articles in the Tribune, is he not?
Mr. KEELEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. Whenever you mentioned anybody as a lumberman or connected with the lumber business or who furnished the sawdust or any similar terms, connecting a prominent citizen with the lumber business, you meant Edward Hines, didn't you?
Mr. KEELEY. Yes, sir.

The manager of that great corporation knew that story, as the editorial shows, because it could not have been based on anything else. He could not have received his information from any other source than that which I have described. Until he told

Mr. Kohlsaat, Mr. Funk had told it only to Mr. McCormick and Mr. Bancroft, and they say they had not mentioned it even among themselves.

Mr. Keeley got no response from that, and on the following Sunday, May 8, within six days of the publication of that editorial, he propounded these questions:

Have you any knowledge of a syndicate that underwrote the election of Mr. LORIMER?

Putting it in the very language of Mr. Funk:

Have you any knowledge of this syndicate advancing the money and then, after the election of Senator LORIMER, sending certain members of the syndicate around and assessing corporations and friends of the Senator a certain proportion of the amount used?

Do you know anything about the identity of this syndicate?

How much did you contribute toward any fund for the election of Senator LORIMER?

Did you solicit any funds for the election of Senator LORIMER?

If you have anything further to say on the subject, Mr. Keeley, of the Tribune, will be glad to hear from you to-night.

These questions cover every feature, every phase of Mr. Funk's version of his interview with Edward Hines, which he had communicated to Mr. Kohlsaat "in confidence." Mr. Kohlsaat in turn told it immediately to Keeley and Lawson, thus bringing these strong forces into the combination that was pursuing Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. Hines told the reporter who called upon him in regard to these questions that he would call on Mr. Keeley and refused to talk with the reporter. Mr. Hines did call on Mr. Keeley at that time. He was indignant. Mr. Keeley says:

He repeated the fact that he had a reputation and a standing in the city of Chicago, and that if we printed anything about him that was libelous he would sue us for libel. I told Mr. Hines that whatever was true I would print about him, and he could sue and be hanged, under those circumstances, pointing out the fact that the Tribune Building was worth a million and a half dollars; and if we printed any lies about him or any libelous statements that he could get that building, and doubtless he could use it in the lumber business. I then asked him again if he desired to answer the questions, and he said "No"; and I ended the interview right then and there.

It turns out, however, that Mr. Hines did really answer the questions, and in response to a question of Senator FLETCHER Mr. Keeley says:

He may have said, in a general way, "I have not any answer to these questions. I do not want to answer them. There is nothing in them." Or something of that kind. I do not remember specifically what was said.

Senator JONES inquired:

Mr. Hines said to you that he considered the questions insulting?

Mr. KEELEY. First a joke, and then insulting, and then libelous.

In further substantiation of the fact that this story must have been known to Mr. Keeley at this time, and that it reached him through Mr. Kohlsaat, Mr. Keeley testifies that Mr. Kohlsaat mentioned the names of Hines, Tilden, Conway, and Roger C. Sullivan in connection with that transaction, and Mr. Mr. Keeley directed the questions to be put to Hines and Conway, and his evidence shows that these same questions were carried to Conway as well as to Hines, and that he sent Mr. Austrian to see Roger Sullivan with the same questions. So that there can be no doubt that Mr. Funk was in that combination on that very Sunday before the "sawdust" article was published Monday morning, May 2, the day the grand jury came together.

If I needed any further corroboration, I would cite the fact that on May 10, 1910, the Chicago Daily News published these same questions and answers. On that day a Tribune reporter called Mr. Hines at his home over the phone and asked if the interview published by the News was correct. Hines said he had not read it. The reporter read it to him, and Hines said, "That is correct," and that he had nothing to add to it. On May 11 the Tribune under glaring headlines reproduced the News's interview with Hines.

And yet from that day to this it has been stated that Mr. Hines never denied any of these stories. He never had a chance to deny them in court or in any investigation, because every time any of them told that story it was told "in confidence"; it must not go into court, it must not be heard in an investigation, it must not be made public. He never had a chance to meet it until he met it before this committee, and yet, as late as January, 1911, when this matter was under consideration in this body, Mr. Kohlsaat wrote a letter to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which appears in the report of the committee, in which he states that he had several times published editorially that $100,000 was raised to buy LORIMER'S election without a protest from anyone. How could it be denied? No one knew the basis for such statements. If Edward Hines saw these statements, he had no means of knowing that they referred to him; and consequently, he could make no denial. The first time the name of any man was connected with this alleged fund was when Clarence S. Funk testified before the Helm committee at Springfield in April, 1911—a month after the Senate had determined that Mr. LORIMER'S election was valid. Mr. Kohlsaat now becomes a very important figure in this movement against Mr. LORIMER. He was the custodian of that story.

ATTORNEY GENERAL STEAD IS BROUGHT INTO THE COMBINATION.

Another party to this combination enters upon the scene at this time, and that is the attorney general of the State. Senator LORIMER made a suggestion a few moments ago concerning the part he took to smother an investigation of legislative graft in Sangamon County. It must be remembered that the publication of the White story in the Tribune was on the morning of Saturday, April 30; that the publication of the Tribune's "sawdust" editorial, based upon Mr. Funk's story, was on the morning of Monday, May 2; that Funk must have communicated it to Kohlsaat as early as Sunday, May 1, and that Kohlsaat must have communicated it to Keeley on that same day.

On May 2, the same day that the Cook County grand jury met in Chicago, the Sangamon County grand jury met in Springfield. The latter is the county in Illinois in which it was charged all of the offenses had been committed. If there was bribery, it was in Springfield. If there was boodling, it was in Springfield. If there was any violation of the law in the legislature, it was committed in Springfield; and immediately after the publication in the Tribune on Saturday, the State's attorney of Sangamon County announced that he would prosecute all of those cases, and issued subpœnas for the witnesses whose names had been made public.

The attorney general of the State, Mr. Stead, promptly volunteered his assistance to the State's attorney of Sangamon County in prosecutions there. The State's attorney issued subpœnas, and published in the papers the statement that he would proceed. But some potent influence began at once to operate to prevent a prosecution in Sangamon County. Gov. Deneen had been in this movement from the 16th of March, when he had his first consultation with Mr. Keeley. He was with Mr. Keeley the morning of the publication of this story, April 30, and gave an interview which was published in the Tribune. He had returned to his home at Springfield, where the offices of Attorney General Stead are located. I have already said that Mr. Stead came forward promptly on Monday, May 2, and volunteered to support Mr. Burke, the State's attorney, in the prosecution he was to begin in Sangamon County.

Then what happened? Before that week had ended he sent his assistant, Mr. Dempsey, to advise Mr. Burke not to proceed with such investigation before the grand jury of Sangamon County. Why not? About the same time we find the governor going to Mr. Gillespie, an attorney of Springfield, concerning whom I will speak by-and-by, and telling him that he is not sure that the attorney general will prosecute those cases. He advised Mr. Gillespie not to engage in the defense, as there might be a legislative investigation, and he might be employed by the State. He asked him to keep out of the so-called bribe cases.

Now, I repeat that before the end of that week and before a single witness had appeared before the Sangamon County grand jury, Mr. Dempsey, the assistant attorney general, went to Mr. Burke and asked him not to proceed with the investigation in that county. Burke refused to comply with the request, and Mr. Dempsey threatened to invoke the aid of the courts to restrain him from doing so.

The strength of this interference to prevent an investigation of alleged offenses is evidenced by the fact that proceedings were actually begun by the attorney general in the courts of that county to legally restrain the State's attorney from doing his plain duty by investigating through the grand jury the guilt of these parties, whose offense, if committed anywhere, was committed in that county. Mr. Burke was brought in before the court and the attorney general appeared in person against him and urged the court to issue a restraining order to prevent Mr. Burke from proceeding with the investigation. The court decided in favor of Mr. Burke's right to proceed and held that the attorney general had no authority to interfere in proceedings pending before the grand jury. Mr. Burke, therefore, having the authority, proceeded.

But what produced this remarkable change of heart on the part of the attorney general and led him to invoke the aid of the courts in an attempt to stifle the investigation? Could it have been anything but the influence of Gov. Deneen? The answer is easily found in the statement of Mr. Gillespie, whom I have mentioned, and it is a significant element of the conversation that he asked Mr. Gillespie what his relations were with the attorney general, and was informed that they were friendly.

And it is still more significant that immediately after, when Attorney General Stead appeared in court to oppose Burke's investigation, he called Gillespie aside and asked if he had been employed or spoken to by anybody in connection with the defense of any of the cases. He stated to Gillespie that he did not know what his attitude would be, and asked him for the time being not to participate in the defense, and Gillespie said to him that he would not at that time. Thus it would appear that the combination already referred to operating in Cook County, acting through Gov. Deneen, had swerved the attorney general from his laudable purpose to aid State's Attorney Burke to prosecute all the alleged legislative offenses in the county where they were committed, and induced him to become their servant in attempting, through his high office, to block such proceeding.

OBSTRUCTION TO JUSTICE IN SANGAMON COUNTY.

How further did the Chicago combination seek to obstruct the orderly course of procedure in the county where alone the jurisdiction lay to investigate and punish legislative corruption?

Mr. Burke summoned White to appear before his grand jury, but he did not respond to the summons. He also summoned Link, Beckemeyer, and others. What was done? To prevent Mr. White from testifying in Sangamon County, the officers who had custody of him, under the authority and by the direction of Mr. Wayman, the State's attorney of Cook County, took him out of the State of Illinois; they went with him from place to place in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan. The first direction given by Mr. Wayman was to take White out of town, because he did not want White to be subpœnaed before the Sangamon County grand jury.

As I have already stated, immediately upon the signing of the contract with the Chicago Tribune on April 29, White was put in the custody of Officer Turner; he was taken to the Palmer House, where White had been stopping, and from there to the Grand Pacific Hotel, where they spent the balance of the night, also Friday, Saturday, and Sunday. On May 2, the day the grand jury met in Cook County, White was taken to State's Attorney Wayman's office and put in charge of an officer from that office. He does not remember exactly the places to which the officers took him, but among other places he was taken to the Del Prado Hotel, Hyde Park. Officer Kerr then took him to Milwaukee with one Otis Yarbrough, and the three spent one day at the Plankinton House. Then White, Officer Kerr, and Yarbrough went together to Madison, Wis. They were there for several days, after which they went to Minneapolis, Minn., where the three remained for two or three days. White swears:

I think Mr. Wayman called us in at that time. Mr. Wayman ordered us out of town; that is all I know. He ordered the officer to take me out. If I remember correctly, he called up the room at the hotel, and I answered the phone, and then he ordered Kerr to take us out of town.

Mr. Wayman himself testifies that he gave that order. He was asked:

That was on your direction?

Mr. WAYMAN. Yes. The towns were not selected by me, but the direction was to keep out of the jurisdiction of Sangamon County for awhile, and out of Illinois.

What is true of Mr. White in that connection is true of Mr. Beckemeyer. In order to keep him away from Sangamon County, Mr. Beckemeyer was sent to Indiana and kept there for a week. He rebelled against being kept out of the State, and returning to Chicago told Mr. Wayman that he was not going to dodge in that way, and in spite of Mr. Wayman's wishes voluntarily went to Springfield to testify.

When Mr. Link was summoned before the Sangamon County grand jury at Springfield to testify, Mr. Wayman sent an officer and a lawyer with him to prevent him from testifying there.

This is a very strange thing, Mr. President, in view of the fact that Cook County had no jurisdiction over Mr. Beckemeyer or Mr. Link or anyone connected with the legislative corruption, except Lee O'Neil Browne, and only over him because he paid a part of the $1,000 to White in Cook County. If any offense had been committed by Mr. Beckemeyer or by Mr. Link, it was in Sangamon County, and it was in that county that they should have been prosecuted, and the State's attorney for that county was not only justified in directing an investigation there, but it was his duty to do so.

What was the reason these witnesses were not allowed to go there? Is it not apparent? Charles A. White claimed that Lee O'Neil Browne had bribed him in consideration of a thousand dollars to vote for Mr. LORIMER. If the Cook County authorities could secure a witness who would state that Browne had paid him the same amount, they would claim before the jury in the Browne trial that it was paid for the same purpose. Their plan was to keep these persons in Cook County, in the custody of officers, where they could control their movements and associations, and use them in the prosecution of Browne.

The Cook County authorities did not want these men to testify in any other county. It was not their purpose to have the participants in the legislative jack pot punished. They even granted immunity for that offense to induce these witnesses to testify when the prosecution of Browne for bribery only was pending. Their sole purpose was to sustain the story of Charles A. White. In this they were not successful. These witnesses did testify in the trials where Charles A. White was a witness, but no jury convicted Browne, because neither of these witnesses ever admitted to anybody and neither ever testified that the money he received from Lee O'Neil Browne had any connection with his vote for Mr. LORIMER.

Returning to proceedings in Sangamon County, Link appeared before the Sangamon County grand jury two or three times, and on the advice of State's Attorney Wayman, of Cook County, refused to answer questions propounded to him, on the ground, as Wayman advised, that he might incriminate himself. Though Link wanted to answer the questions, still Wayman said, "Don't do it, Link; don't do it."

Mr. Link testified:

Q. Did he tell you not to answer the questions of the State's attorney or the grand jury of Sangamon County?—A. If the senatorial committee please, the question all hinged upon one answer, "No" or "Yes," to one certain question, and that question was, "Did you receive or were you offered or do you know of anybody being offered any money in Springfield for voting on any question?" That was the question, and when I finally got permission from Mr. Wayman, which I answered positively, right straight out, "No." I answered, "No." That is all there was about that. He wouldn't let me answer the question at all.

In order to induce Mr. Link to testify before the grand jury of Sangamon County the State's attorney of that county went to the court and secured an immunity order in his favor, so that if he should testify he would not incriminate himself, and even under those circumstances we find him there in the custody of an officer and accompanied by a legal adviser sent by the State's attorney of Cook County and at that county's expense.

Let me repeat, the purpose of the combination, as I call it, of all forces mentioned was to secure evidence to sustain White's claim that the $1,000 paid by Browne to White was in pursuance of an agreement with Browne to vote for Senator LORIMER. To this end every instrumentality known to the law and unknown to the law was invoked. The charge has been shown to be unfounded by the courts of Illinois, where it was fully and carefully and ably tried. This is all the more remarkable when it is remembered that in the preparation of the Browne case and in the attempt to secure evidence that would in some way connect fraud with the election of Senator LORIMER methods were adopted and means employed more censurable in their nature than can be conceived by any student of history who has respect for human freedom.

White, Beckemeyer, and Link, and without doubt others, had each received $1,900 from the "jack pot," made up of contributions from corporations in the interest of special legislation. In each instance $1,000 was paid by Browne and $900 by Wilson. In each instance it came from a common fund and must have been for a common purpose. White's claim that he had been bribed to vote for Mr. LORIMER was wholly unsupported. The purpose of this combination was to make it appear that the payments to Beckemeyer and Link were for the same purpose, and so corroborate White's story. But neither Beckemeyer nor Link ever testified to any such thing. The story of Charles A. White was not only unsupported, but was discredited, and Mr. Browne was discharged on a verdict of acquittal of the charge.

METHODS ADOPTED WITH WITNESSES IN COOK COUNTY.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to the way that witnesses were treated in Chicago when called before the grand jury in this attempt to extort from them something that would support White's story of bribery and something that would give color to the statement that the thousand dollars they had each received from Mr. Browne was for the purpose of inducing them to vote for Mr. LORIMER. It appears that all these witnesses went before the grand jury of Cook County and were asked the question whether they were in St. Louis on July 15, 1909. It is true that they had been there and that they had received $900 each from Wilson, but each of them denied being in St. Louis that day. They supposed they would be prosecuted for having received the money. What happened? They were immediately placed under arrest. Let me refer to the testimony of State's Attorney Wayman. He certainly knows why this was done.

This question was put to him by Mr. Marble:

Why did you place these witnesses in custody or under this surveillance?

Mr. WAYMAN. Well, there are different answers applying to the different witnesses. I will take them seriatim. I placed Link in custody because he had committed a crime in my presence. I placed Beckemeyer in custody because he had committed a crime in my presence. I placed Clark and Shephard in custody believing that they had committed crimes in my presence, and I did so under the authority of the statute of this State.

The CHAIRMAN. To what statute do you refer?

Mr. WAYMAN. Section 342 of the criminal code of this State.

Mr. MARBLE. Were officers kept with these men against the will of the men and against their consent?

Mr. WAYMAN. Yes; officers were kept with Clark, Link, Shephard, and Beckemeyer on the afternoon of the 5th against their will. Of course, they were placed in custody against their will, and they were held in custody involuntarily—all those four—until they were discharged from the custody, etc.

Now, what was the authority under which the arrests were made? The statute reads like this:

Arrests without warrant. 4. An arrest may be made by an officer or by a private person without warrant for a criminal offense committed or attempted in his presence, and by an officer when a criminal offense has in fact been committed and he has reasonable ground for believing that the person to be arrested has committed it.

Mr. President, the construction placed upon that statute by the State's attorney for Cook County is that if he, sitting in the grand-jury room, is of opinion that a witness has committed perjury he can place him under arrest for a crime committed in his presence. What do the lawyers here say to that proposition? If there had been a criminal assault upon the street, of course it could be done; but think of a State's attorney sitting with the grand jury and placing men under arrest the moment he thinks they have sworn falsely, and under the authority of such a statute.

In each of these cases just as soon as the witness had ceased testifying an indictment was filed against him for perjury. These men were placed and kept under arrest; but if arrested on those indictments or arrested under a statute of the State, why were they not committed! Why were they permitted to go to hotels with an officer of and at the expense of Cook County? Why were they permitted to indulge in intoxicants by these same officers, and why were the expenses of drinks charged in the same way? Why were they permitted to do anything and everything of the character indicated before being again brought before the grand jury? Officer Keeley, in whose charge these men were placed, answers these questions. He testified that his instructions from the State's attorney's office were "to take them out and treat them right," which he understood to mean that he was to get them in a condition where they would talk more freely before the grand jury.

Why did they afterward admit their presence at St. Louis and the receipt of $900 each from Wilson? Because it was true and because Robert E. Wilson was called before that grand jury, and could not deny that he had been in St. Louis on that day, because he was registered at a hotel. He told the grand jury he was there and admitted these men were with him, giving some apparently innocent reason for the meeting. Thereupon these men went before the State's attorney and frankly admitted being in St. Louis and receiving $900 each, under conditions of which I will speak a little later. Shephard never confessed that he received any money or anything of that kind, although he admitted being in St. Louis. The same is true of Clark.

WHY LINK VOTED FOR MR. LORIMER.

Remembering that the payments to each of the three men, White, Beckemeyer, and Link, were precisely alike, $1,000 to each from Browne and $900 from Wilson, and that White is the only one who makes any claim that the first payment differed from the second in character or purpose, it is important to know just what influences did operate to induce these men severally to vote for Mr. LORIMER. Let it ever be remembered that Beckemeyer and Link have never been driven to the confession that the money paid them was from any source other than the jack-pot fund of the legislature—and even White admits that his second payment was from that source.

What did, in fact, move these men to vote for Mr. LORIMER?

Take first the case of Mr. Link. As early as March it appears that Mr. Link wanted to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

I read from his testimony:

Q. You were going to vote for him, even though you were a Democrat, by reason of his views on the deep waterway; is that correct?—A. Will you allow me to tell you when I made up my mind to vote for him?

Q. Yes, sir.—A. In March, 1909—provided we could not elect a Democrat.

Q. As early as March?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had you voted for any Republican after March?—A. No, sir.

Q. Now, Mr. Link, you heard Mr. LORIMER on the deep-waterway proposition when?—A. You mean prior to the——

Q. To May 26?—A. I heard him and followed him in our county when he came there.

Q. When was that?—A. In the fall of 1908, I think.

Q. 1908. It was by reason of his views on the deep-waterway proposition that you concluded, if the occasion arose, to vote for Mr. LORIMER for United States Senator, was it not?—A. Yes, sir; I was opposed to Illinois going it alone. I wanted the United States Government to give us help.

Q. It was by reason of Mr. LORIMER'S expressions on the deep waterway——A. (Interrupting.) His attitude; yes, sir.

Q. That you concluded you would vote for him for United States Senator?—A. Yes, sir; I thought he was the greatest man in Illinois.

Q. Was there any other fact that impelled you to vote for him?—A. Not any emphatic fact; no, sir.

* * * * * * *

Q. Your county, the largest county in your senatorial district, is Madison County?—A. Yes, sir. It borders on the Mississippi.

Q. And bordering on the Mississippi, it would be affected by this deep waterway?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You stated to the counsel on the other side on the direct examination that you heard Senator LORIMER speak on the deep waterway; was that in your county or one of the counties in your senatorial district?—A. He spoke three times in the fall of 1908 in Madison County, and had charts with him explaining the plans, etc., and the practicability, and I was deeply interested. I heard him at two places, and I heard him at Granite City and also at Edwardsville.

Link makes further statements, and finally the following testimony was given:

Q. When for the first time did you vote for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator?—A. The 26th of May, I believe.

Q. 1909, sir?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In other words, the first time you ever voted for Mr. LORIMER for Senator was the day he was elected?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What, if any, talk did you have with anyone——A. What do you refer to?

Q. ——with respect to voting for Mr. LORIMER for United States Senator prior to May 26, 1909?—A. With Mr. LORIMER himself.

Q. When?—A. Some 10 days prior to his election.

Q. What did he say to you and what did you say to him?—A. I personally promised him my vote.

Q. What else was said?—A. "How do you do," and so forth.

Q. Anything else?—A. Not to my recollection. You have got the substance of the conversation.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you and Lee O'Neil Browne ever discuss your interview with LORIMER?—A. Yes, sir; to some extent.

Q. When?—A. Some three or four days before LORIMER was elected, to my recollection.

Now we reach his first interview with Lee O'Neil Browne, in which he says:

A. He asked me if—do you want to know what he asked me?

Q. I want the conversation.—A. The conversation was this, to my recollection: He said, "Hello, Mike," and I said, "Hello, Lee." He says, "Come here a minute, Mike, I want to see you," and I said, "All right." He says, "Mike, would you vote for a Republican for the United States Senate?" I says, "Lee, it is according to what Republican you have in view." He says, "How would Mr. LORIMER suit you, Mike?" I had the laugh on him right there, and I said, "Lee, I have got the laugh on you; I beat you to it;" that I promised Mr. LORIMER a week or 10 days ago personally. That is all the conversation that took place.

Mr. Link appeared before the grand jury of Cook County May 5, and testified that he was not in St. Louis July 15, or any other day that summer, to meet Wilson nor anyone else.

Friday, May 6, the indictment was voted against him and it was in process of preparation. Link left the grand jury room and was joined by Mr. Wayman, and a long conversation was held in which Mr. Wayman succeeded admirably in getting at the situation. He said in his testimony:

I called him to one side and said, "Mr. Link, you had better wire for your son to come to Chicago." I was under the impression that he had a son. He said, "Unfortunately, I have no son." I said, "You had better wire for your brother." He said, "No; he can not do me any good in the trouble I am in now." I said, "If there are any of your folks that you want to notify to come up here, and I think they should, we will notify them." He thought the question over—

* * * * * * *

The bond is the thing that is bothering me. If I were down in my home town and county I could get all the bond that was wanted, but I am up here a stranger and I do not know about a bond.

Then Mr. Wayman took the matter up in another light. He said:

"I will tell you what I am going to do with you, Mr. Link. You need not let the bond proposition worry you at all. I have got a plan mapped out for you that I want you to follow. You take my advice on it. I am not going to have this capias served on you at all. I am going to permit you to go back to your home, and I will order the sheriff to hold the capias. When you get down there, you consult the lawyer whom you have known the longest, or your warmest friends, and tell them the exact situation. After you have done that, then you can arrange for your bond and return here next week and give a bond." He said, "Well, that is pretty fair." He then said to me, "What lawyer would you recommend here?"

Mr. Wayman told him he could not recommend a lawyer.

Without stopping to read that testimony I will say that Mr. Wayman did everything in his power to get Link to seek the best advice obtainable and be governed by it.

Telling him that he should tell his lawyer the circumstances, and then be guided by his advice, adding:

Whether or not you should stand trial on this perjury charge and take the chance of going to the penitentiary (for that is the penalty under the statute) in defense of the gang that got you into this conspiracy and are now ditching you, or whether you should tell the truth, purge yourself of this perjury, and help the State of Illinois to retrieve itself from the outrage that you and the other conspirators have heaped upon her." I said, "Tell him or them the truth. That is all I want you to do; and then return here."

They had further conversation which, according to Mr. Wayman's testimony, was as follows. He, Mr. Link, said:

"I want you to understand one thing now. I never was promised any money to vote for LORIMER." I said, "It does not make any difference what you were promised. What I am trying to find out is, why were you at St. Louis on July 15?" He said, "I would like to tell you, but I don't want to hurt Lee. Lee was pretty kind to me when I was in the legislature." I said, "That is not material to the issue here at all." He finally said, "How do you stand in St. Louis?" I said, "Mr. Link, the situation as I understand it is you have committed no crime in St. Louis. No testimony here shows the commission of a crime in St. Louis." He said, "How do you stand in Sangamon County?" I told him I did not know the State's attorney of Sangamon County, but that the State of Illinois was a big institution."

They had further conversation until it came to the point that Link was assured of full immunity if he would tell the truth.

Mr. Wayman testified that he said to him:

"Why don't you tell the facts?" He said, "I will tell you what I will do. I will tell you the exact facts, with the understanding that if I conclude to stand trial on the perjury charge you will not use it against me."

Mr. Wayman admits that in making his confession Link expressly denies that the payment to him had anything to do with his vote for Mr. LORIMER.

He testifies:

I agreed to that. That was Friday night. Before he left he said, "Well, I want you to understand"—and he repeated this at least half a dozen times—"that I was promised no money to vote for Senator LORIMER," and then, when he agreed to tell the facts, he said that on July 15, at St. Louis, he was there. He told who was there and said that he received $900 from Robert E. Wilson; that prior to that, on a date that he could not fix, he received a thousand dollars from Lee O'Neil Browne in St. Louis, having on each occasion received word to go to St. Louis, but that Lee O'Neil Browne did not tell him what the money was for and he did not know what it was for. He said, "Now I have told you all I know."

Thereupon he was taken before the grand jury and testified as he had stated to Mr. Wayman. Mr. Wayman said:

"Are you going before the grand jury and tell the facts?" He said he was. I at once took him before the grand jury. That was Saturday morning, the 7th. He there testified as he had stated to me. I went at once into court with him before Judge Kersten and nolled the case in open court and Mr. Link left at once for his home in Madison County.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Wayman, you stated what he told you about Mr. Browne, that he paid him a thousand dollars, but did not tell what it was for?

Mr. WAYMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not say anything regarding Mr. Wilson. Did he tell you what Wilson said the $900 was for?

Mr. WAYMAN. No; I do not think he did. My impression is that he just got the money, and that he had no information from any of them as to what it was for, and I remember telling Mr. Link, "It will be a question for the jury as to what it was for."

Mr. Wayman said that he neglected to state one part of the conversation as to his reasons for voting for Mr. LORIMER, and he proceeds as follows:

Mr. WAYMAN. He said that Lee O'Neil Browne met him and asked him to vote for Senator LORIMER; asked him if he could vote for a Republican; that he said, "That will depend on what Republican it is." He said Browne said, "Senator LORIMER." Then he went on and told me, "I said, 'Lee, I beat you to it'; I was considerably puffed up to think I had beaten a smart man like Lee O'Neil Browne to it. Two men came and got me and took me out riding one evening, and asked me to vote for Senator LORIMER"; and I think he said after their talk they had taken him up to call on Senator LORIMER, and he had there promised Senator LORIMER that he would vote for him. That was prior to the time that Lee O'Neil Browne spoke to him, and he said that his reason for his friendliness for Mr. LORIMER was because of Mr. LORIMER'S attitude on the deep waterway; that he had heard Mr. LORIMER during the prior summer on two or three different occasions in that district, and had heard Mr. LORIMER before the legislature, in March, I think he said; that his district was a large district on the Mississippi River, and that the reason he voted for Mr. LORIMER was because of Mr. LORIMER'S attitude on the deep waterway. He always maintained that the financial transactions subsequent had nothing whatever to do with his vote. That is the general outline of it.

There we have presented the facts given to the State's attorney of Cook County by Link, upon which he received full immunity for his offense and was set at liberty. Nowhere did Link ever tell any different story, but over and over again he stated and insisted that his vote for Mr. LORIMER was free and voluntary, and that the money received by him had no connection whatever with his vote for Mr. LORIMER; State's Attorney Wayman fully understood this and explicitly says so in his testimony; and understanding it he discharged Mr. Link from custody, with an order of immunity in his pocket and promises of further protection in Sangamon County, which he undertook to carry out. And yet, led by the Chicago press, almost every newspaper in the United States has innocently aided in giving circulation to the falsehood that Link confessed that he was paid for voting for Mr. LORIMER.

The testimony on pages 5752, 5753, and 5754 of the Record shows that thereafter Link was on friendly terms with Mr. Wayman, and particularly so in regard to all matters relating to the proceedings in Sangamon County. Link refrained from responding to a subpœna requiring him to appear in Springfield until he consulted Mr. Wayman and was advised by him to go and assured that he would have a lawyer there to meet him, and Mr. Wayman did send an attorney, Mr. Reed, to Springfield to prevent Link from testifying before the grand jury of Sangamon County in the investigation which the State's attorney of that county, Mr. Burke, was attempting to make, and wherein, if anywhere, Link's testimony should have been taken. In all subsequent proceedings Link was governed by Mr. Wayman, and the relations between them were of a cordial and friendly character. Mr. Wayman thought he had done him a great favor in advising him to disclose the truth, and Link was perfectly frank and outspoken in his declaration that he did not receive the thousand dollars in consideration of voting for Mr. LORIMER.

So it was with all these witnesses—they never got beyond that point. Not one of them, save White, ever said, however pressed, that any consideration moved to them by reason of their vote for Senator LORIMER.

WHY DID BECKEMEYER VOTE FOR MR. LORIMER?

To those who have followed the history of this case I suppose the name Beckemeyer is familiar. It is very important that we examine Mr. Beckemeyer's testimony in the light of all the circumstances under which it was given, inasmuch as he is one of the men who is known to have received $1,900 from this common fund which I have before discussed, and one of the witnesses who testified before the Cook County grand jury and at both trials of Lee O'Neil Browne and before both senatorial committees.

Mr. Beckemeyer is comparatively a young man. He is the son of a prosperous banker. He is a lawyer by profession, but without a large practice; he is not a strong man, not a virile man, and under ordinary circumstances not what would be called a bad man. But in the legislature he fell into those currents which have been disclosed in evidence, and was one of the participants in the distribution of the so-called jack-pot fund of 1909. He admits it very frankly.

Mr. Beckemeyer was a follower of Lee O'Neil Browne in that legislature. It will be remembered there were two Democratic factions—one led by Browne, the other by Tippit. Beckemeyer says he followed Browne's leadership generally through that session. He testifies as follows in answer to Mr. Healy:

Was your Democratic colleague from that district a member of the Browne faction?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir; he was not.

Mr. HEALY. With which faction was he identified?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. He was of the Tippit faction—what is known as the Tippit faction?

Both of these men were Democrats and from the same district.

The reason given by Mr. Beckemeyer for voting for Mr. Browne in the caucus and allying himself with the Browne faction during that session of the legislature was given in his testimony, where he says:

When I went to Springfield that session I really had not made up my mind who I was going to support for minority leader, but when it came to the showdown between Tippit and Browne—I did not know Browne well, but I knew Tippit, and I did not like Tippit personally. That was about the only reason why I went with the Browne faction.

I read the foregoing at this time because yesterday the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] inquired whether it appears in evidence that Browne paid any of his followers anything in consideration of their support of him for the position of minority leader. Nothing in the evidence would warrant such a conclusion, and anything I may have said that could create such an impression must have been misconstrued. Mr. Beckemeyer's testimony shows that he supported Browne for minority leader more because he did not like Tippit than for any other reason.

As time went on these two Democratic factions became more and more opposed to each other, for some reason which it is not altogether easy to understand. In relation to that question Mr. Beckemeyer testified, in answer to a question by Senator KENYON:

Would his request to you to vote for a bill be made to you alone, or in concert with other people, or while you were with other members of the legislature?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I could tell you about the conditions that we were in there, Senator.

Senator KENYON. That is what I am asking you.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. The Browne faction and the Tippit faction were continually at daggers' points, and there were a great many times when the Browne faction was on one side of a question and the Tippit faction on the other side, and very often on different matters. It was necessary for us to stay absolutely together, and we always did stay together through the whole session—the Browne faction in opposition to the Tippit faction, regardless sometimes of whether we really wanted to vote that way on that particular thing.

Later, explaining the lengths to which he would follow Mr. Browne as a leader, Mr. Beckemeyer testified as follows:

I understood you to say that you would have voted for any bill that he asked you to vote for.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I would have voted for nearly every bill; I would have done anything that Lee O'Neil Browne wanted us to do, and I think that was the condition of nearly every Browne Democrat—that they would have done anything that Browne wanted; that is, if it was within reason.

Senator KENYON. Would you have voted for Gov. Deneen for Senator if he had asked you to?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No; I do not think I would, and I do not think that there was any danger of Lee O'Neil Browne asking that at that time.

Senator KENYON. Would you have voted for Senator Hopkins if Browne had asked you to?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir; I would not.

Senator KENYON. Then, you would not have voted for anyone that he asked you to?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I would not have voted for anyone he asked me to; no.

It appears from all the testimony of Mr. Beckemeyer that he was opposed to Mr. Hopkins from the beginning. This was true of all Democrats in that body. Beckemeyer was a seatmate of Mr. Alschuler, who represented the Hopkins district in the house of representatives, and says "that George Alschuler never stopped, from the day the legislature conveyed until Mr. LORIMER was elected, hollering for somebody to beat Hopkins." As to his own attitude on that subject, he testified:

Mr. HANECY. And you told George Alschuler and everybody else that you talked with, from very early in the session of the forty-sixth general assembly, that you would vote for anybody to defeat Senator Hopkins, did you not?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir; I said it often.

Mr. HANECY. And you did not care as to the name or individuality of the person who would beat Hopkins, but you would vote for anybody who could beat him?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Well, I think my decision at that time was really to vote for Ed. Shurtleff.

Mr. HANECY. Ed. Shurtleff was speaker of the house, and a Republican?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANECY. And there was very general talk throughout the session of the legislature, among Democrats as well as Republicans, of electing Shurtleff Senator, was there not?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. There was quite a good deal of talk of it; yes, sir.

Mr. HANECY. And it was the general talk for a long time before the election of Mr. LORIMER that Shurtleff could get nearly the entire Democratic vote for Senator?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I do not know about that. I was told that he could have anything. Practically all of them had voted for him for United States Senator at some time or other. I was told that.

Then the question came:

Mr. HANECY. And that was so from early in the session, was it not; that is, after it appeared that Hopkins could not be elected?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir; I will say that.

Mr. HANECY. There never was any hope on the part of the Democrats, so far as you know, of electing a Democratic Senator, was there?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No; I think nobody ever dreamed of that.

But it developed that, although he was very much opposed to Mr. Hopkins and believed that he would vote for any other Republican, and do so willingly, in order to defeat his reelection, he could not vote for Gov. Deneen, and when, as the end of the session approached, he really faced the proposition of voting for a Republican, Mr. Beckemeyer wavered. He was not a strong, resolute, independent man, as were some others in that legislature. He had an eye out to his political future; he realized the power of public sentiment; and he did not know how his political supporters at home might feel and he became timid. This question was put to him:

Senator KENYON. Was it at all hard for you to vote for a Republican?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did not want to vote for a Republican; no.

Senator KENYON. Did it strike you as at all strange that 53 Democrats should vote for a Republican?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. It did; yes, sir; that is one reason why I protested at that time.

Senator KENYON. Did you think that was to demoralize the Republican Party?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I will say that was one of the arguments that was generally applied around the statehouse at that time; yes, sir.

Senator KENYON. That was used, was it?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.

Senator KENYON. And used in the Browne faction?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes.

Senator KENYON. Was that somewhat persuasive with you, Mr. Beckemeyer?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I can not say as to that. I thought there was some truth in that kind of an argument; that it might do that.

At that point the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] intervened and put this inquiry:

It was not very hard for you to vote for a Republican, was it?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did vote for one.

Senator JONES. You testified here that you had frequently stated you would vote for any Republican to beat Hopkins.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did; yes, sir.

Senator JONES. And you felt that way?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.

Senator JONES. And you found a good many Democrats in the legislature who felt that way, too, did you not?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.

Senator JONES. That probably accounted for the vote of a good many of the 53 Democrats?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I think it did, Senator.

That was his judgment upon the question of what influenced many of the Democrats in that body to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. Beckemeyer testified that he first heard of the candidacy of Mr. LORIMER about 10 days prior to the election, possibly two weeks, not more than that, and that down to that time he had supported Democratic aspirants for that position, and that he had taken no public position in relation to any change, except that he had said from time to time that he would vote for anyone to defeat Mr. Hopkins.

But, as I said before, when he actually faced the proposition of supporting any particular Republican he was so much of a Democrat that he hesitated to do so. He told a number of people, two or three days before the election of Senator LORIMER, that he was not going to vote for Mr. LORIMER for Senator. He testified as follows:

Mr. HANECY. You told a number of people two or three days before the election of Senator LORIMER that you were not going to vote for Mr. LORIMER for Senator, did you not?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. You say I told several people?

Mr. HANECY. You told that to a number of people two or three days before he was elected.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I do not remember just how many days before that, but I did say that. When it came to a show-down I said that; yes, sir.

Mr. HANECY. You told Lee O'Neil Browne two or three days before Mr. LORIMER was elected that you were not going to vote for Mr. LORIMER, did you not?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did; yes, sir.

Now, it is a fact which never has been denied by anyone that at least three days before he voted for Mr. LORIMER he told Lee O'Neil Browne he would not vote for Mr. LORIMER. In an interview between them Mr. Beckemeyer said he told Browne, "I did not think I could afford to do it; that it would kill anyone at home politically—a Democrat—who did that. He then insisted that it would not, and insisted that it was a proper thing to do politically.

That is the only argument, as the evidence shows, used by Lee O'Neil Browne upon Mr. Beckemeyer—that it was right to do it politically, as the situation then stood. Mr. Healy inquired of Mr. Beckemeyer as follows:

Tell us what he said, Mr. Beckemeyer, if you can remember his language. If you can not, give us the substance of his conversation with you.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I do not remember what his language was.

Mr. HEALY. Give us the substance of the talk.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. About all I could say about the substance was that I argued for a minute or two that I could not afford to do it, and he argued the other way—that I could afford to do it.

Mr. HEALY. What reason did he assign in favor of his argument?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I do not remember that he assigned any other reason except that practically all the Democrats were going to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. HEALY. What was said in reference to that, if anything?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I told him that that might put a different complexion on my view, if that was the case.

In that statement will be seen the beginning of the process which led Mr. Beckemeyer to vote for Mr. LORIMER. If all the Democrats, or a substantial portion of them, in that body were to vote for him, that was enough to relieve him before his constituents at home, and in his desire to oppose and prevent the reelection of Mr. Hopkins he would be very glad then to vote for Mr. LORIMER. This put an entirely different aspect upon the situation. What follows?

Mr. HEALY. What else did you say?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I do not remember that I said anything, particularly. I think I asked him who of the Democrats were going to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. HEALY. What did he say in answer to that question?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. He then produced a list of all of the Democrats that he said were going to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

He showed that list to Mr. Beckemeyer, read off the names, and Mr. Beckemeyer says:

I do not know that I can recall. I think he read off nearly every name that voted for Mr. LORIMER of the Democrats.

Mr. HEALY. About how many was that?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I believe there were 53 Democrats that voted for Mr. LORIMER. There must have been forty-some-odd representatives.

And that list which was shown to him at that time indicated that substantially forty-odd from the house of representatives would vote for Mr. LORIMER. Then Mr. Healy asked him this question:

Do you remember the names of any of the Democratic members of the legislature who were going to vote for Mr. LORIMER, according to the information then given you by Mr. Browne?

Mr. Beckemeyer replied:

I was rather anxious to know how some of those that I was closely associated with were going to vote. Then I was also anxious to know whether any or a large part of the Tippit faction were going to vote for Mr. LORIMER. According to his list a majority of both factions were going to vote that way.

There it will be seen is an entirely new situation. Lee O'Neil Browne was not representing his faction in that conversation. He was telling him what Democrats were going to vote for Mr. LORIMER, and he gave him the names of those who had been his keenest rivals all during that session.

What does that indicate? That he had been bought? It is ridiculous to say that under those conditions this man had been bought to vote for Mr. LORIMER. He was saying he would not vote for him and was giving valid party reasons for his conclusion, but he was impressed by the statement that nearly all the other Democrats were going to vote for Mr. LORIMER, and especially that the Tippit followers were to do so.

Does Beckemeyer's conduct indicate that he was controlled by Mr. Browne? Certainly not. What did he do? He went immediately to ascertain what the home sentiment would be. He found that among those names given him by Mr. Browne were Alschuler and Shephard and Luke and Gorman and McCollum from his own district and members of Tippit faction, and Tippit. He said if he could become satisfied that all those people would vote for LORIMER he would be relieved of the home criticism as a Democrat for voting for a Republican and he would be willing to join the others and vote for Mr. LORIMER. So the next day he went and had a consultation with these men and ascertained for himself that they would vote as indicated and he was correspondingly relieved and decided to do the same. Then what did he do?

Here follows an important and controlling incident in connection with Mr. Beckemeyer's action. On May 25, the day before the election came off, he sought and had a consultation with Mr. Holstlaw and Mr. McCollum, Mr. Holstlaw being the senator and Mr. McCollum being the other Democratic representative from his district. These three came to an agreement that they would vote solidly for the same candidate, and that candidate was to be Mr. LORIMER.

On the morning of May 26 Beckemeyer was again fearful of public sentiment among his Democratic supporters at home and wanted to vote for a Democrat.

He was timid and went to the capitol wavering and doubtful, not fully decided for whom he should cast his vote that day. Here is what he says he did:

Mr. HEALY. Did you make any effort or attempt to induce Mr. Holstlaw and Mr. McCollum to change their vote or to change their attitude on the senatorial situation that day?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did.
Mr. HEALY. What effort did you make in that respect?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. Mr. McCollum was claiming that I was under obligations to vote for Mr. LORIMER, on the talk we had the day before.
Mr. HEALY. What did he say to you about that?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. He said he was going to hold me to my word when I had said that I was not going to vote for Mr. LORIMER on that morning. I sent Mr. Murray to him, from our town, to try and get Mr. McCollum and Holstlaw to release me on that word, if there was such a word. They were going to stand on it.
Mr. HEALY. And what did Mr. Murray report to you?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. Mr. Murray reported that they told him to go and attend to his own business.
Mr. HEALY. You had had a talk with Mr. McCollum before you sent Mr. Murray to him, had you not?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes. I told Mr. McCollum that morning that I did not think I was going to vote for Mr. LORIMER.
Mr. HEALY. And that was the morning of what day?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. That was immediately before the election of LORIMER, in the morning, probably 9 o'clock or such a matter.

It is just as clear as the noonday sun that when Mr. Beckemeyer that morning went to the State house he had it in his mind not to vote for Mr. LORIMER, not because he did not like him, not because there was any opposition in his heart to Mr. LORIMER, but because he did not as a Democrat want to vote for a Republican, and he was afraid of the criticism that might follow his action at home. He talked to his neighbor, the State's attorney of his county, and sent him to see Senator Holstlaw and Mr. McCollum to ask that he be released from the understanding they had reached the day before that they would join and make the vote from their district a unit for Mr. LORIMER. There is no one thing in the evidence more clearly established than the fact that what I have described is the attitude with which he approached the question of the vote that morning. When Mr. Murray came back and reported that they told him to go about his business, he was left morally bound by the agreement into which he had voluntarily entered with his own friends the day before and concerning which Mr. Browne had absolutely nothing to do, concerning which Mr. Browne had no information whatever. Even when he found that Mr. Holstlaw and Mr. McCollum thought he ought to stand by them, he was still in the same timid, anxious frame of mind.

Then what occurred Mr. Beckemeyer's testimony fully discloses.

Mr. HEALY. After Mr. Murray reported to you, whom, if anyone, did you talk with about the senatorial election?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. Really the only one that I remember that morning before the election was probably George Alschuler.
Mr. HEALY. What was your talk with Mr. Alschuler?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. It was nothing more than that I told him I was not going to vote for Mr. LORIMER. He then began to beg me to vote for him.
Mr. HEALY. What did he say?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. I do not remember anything particularly that he said, except insisting on my staying with the bunch and voting for LORIMER.

He says the time at which he had that talk with Mr. Alschuler was shortly before the house convened that morning, and he does not remember of talking with anyone else.

Mr. HEALY. Did you have a talk with Lee O'Neil Browne that day?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. During the time Mr. Alschuler and myself were discussing the matter Mr. Browne sat right in front of the seats that Mr. Alschuler and I occupied, and Alschuler called Browne's attention to the fact that I was going to quit, and Mr. Browne merely turned around and rather begged or insisted that I stay with the bunch and not quit at this time.
Mr. HEALY. By "the bunch" whom did you understand him to mean?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did not understand anything more than the Browne faction. That is about all I could understand about it—to stay with him, rather.

That is the only time shown by the evidence that Mr. Browne did anything to influence his action. Further along in the testimony the following occurs:

Mr. HANECY. You knew the morning that Senator LORIMER was elected that you were going to vote for him, did you not?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. No; I will say that I did not.
Mr. HANECY. You did not know that?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir.
Mr. HANECY. When did you first know that you would vote for Senator LORIMER before you did vote for him?

Here is the final utterance of Mr. Beckemeyer on that subject:

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I can say that when I first made up my mind definitely to vote for Mr. LORIMER was at the time of my last talk with Mr. Alschuler, just a very few minutes before my name was called on the roll.

But let me again remind the Senate that Mr. Alschuler was not there to favor any particular man for Senator. He is a Democrat, a man of prominence, the present leader of the Democratic Party of the Illinois House of Representatives. He was there to defeat Senator Hopkins, his neighbor, whom he disliked exceedingly, and all the testimony goes to show that during the entire session he spent his best energies in the effort to drive him from the field.

Mr. HANECY. And Mr. Alschuler never held out any inducement to you that you would or could or might get any consideration, or even any favor of any kind, afterwards, because of your vote for Mr. LORIMER, did he?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir; he did not.
Mr. HANECY. Mr. Alschuler was opposing Senator Hopkins very strenuously, and he was for Senator LORIMER because he thought Senator LORIMER was the man who could beat Mr. Hopkins?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.

I have presented, I think, a fair summary of all the evidence bearing upon the influences which induced Mr. Beckemeyer to vote for Mr. LORIMER. If he had been bribed to vote for Mr. LORIMER would he have been dallying with that question all through Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday up to the very hour of the vote? It is absolutely absurd to make such a claim, in view of all the facts disclosed in the testimony. He has insisted from that time to this that there was no previous understanding that he was to vote for Mr. LORIMER. He has insisted from that time to this that the money he received from Lee O'Neil Browne had nothing whatever to do with the question of his voting for Mr. LORIMER. He insisted to the state's attorney of Cook County when he was under indictment and under arrest, and when he was having a heart-to-heart talk with him, that it had nothing to do with his vote. He has insisted that such was not the case from beginning to the end of the controversy.

Mr. Wayman understood it when he had him testify the last time before the grand jury of Cook County, and granted him immunity. Yet it is claimed by those who are prosecuting this case against Senator LORIMER that Beckemeyer is one of the men who confessed to receiving money for voting for him, and that idea has spread until it has affected public sentiment throughout the country. This allegation has been made by the Chicago press and repeated in the public press of the Nation until it is believed by the masses, and on every hand comes the inquiry: How can you say that Mr. LORIMER is not guilty, or his friends are not guilty, when here are four men who have confessed that they got money for voting for him. No man has ever said such a thing, except Charles A. White, and he said it in consideration of $3,500 and his living "on the fat of the land" for nearly a year. It is upon his testimony, and his alone, that the Senate must stand, if it is to stand at all, on the claim that bribery was used to induce the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

In the debates that were had in this body, when the matter was up before, we heard a great deal about Abrahams being the bellwether—that just as Abrahams voted all the rest voted. That was an expression that was taken up in the speech of a distinguished Member of this body, and carried from one end of the country to the other. Now, what did it mean? It all came out in evidence, and if you turn to page 2922 of the RECORD you will find it. Browne had insisted as a condition precedent that he would not support Mr. LORIMER, unless it became apparent there were enough votes besides his own to insure his election.

Senator LORIMER made precisely the same condition. He insisted that no vote should be taken and that his name should not be presented to the legislature until assured of a sufficient number of votes to elect him. So, the question was, When should his name go before the legislature. Should it be on the morning of the 25th or on the morning of the 26th of May. When this matter was decided, on the morning of the 26th, Abrahams, being at the head of the alphabetical list, was the first man to vote. Abrahams was known to be for LORIMER, and it was understood by all of Mr. LORIMER's friends that when Abrahams voted for him the time had come when others might do the same. That is all there was to that circumstance. I myself asked Mr. Beckemeyer this question:

There was some question there, was there not, Mr. Beckemeyer, as to when the Democratic vote should be cast for Mr. LORIMER?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. There was; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And when was that determined?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I do not know that it was determined, except that morning.

The CHAIRMAN. You understood when Browne made that announcement there that it had been determined that the vote should come that day?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was the significance of the remark to you?

That is, the remark to follow Abrahams.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.

That is all the significance there is to that.

METHODS PRACTICED ON BECKEMEYER.

It is admitted that Mr. Beckemeyer received $1,900—$1,000 from Browne and $900 from Wilson. Both payments were made in St. Louis, and it is admitted both payments were made from the jack-pot fund. Cook County had no jurisdiction whatever over Mr. Beckemeyer. If he had committed any offense it was in Sangamon County. When he was summoned to testify before the Cook County grand jury after the publication of May 2, he came there as a witness. He could not be indicted in Cook County for any offense that he had committed up to the time he reached there. That is perfectly evident. If he had accepted a bribe to vote for Mr. LORIMER the jurisdiction was in Sangamon County where the offense was alleged to have been committed; but he was called to Chicago for a specific purpose, as all the evidence goes to show. It was to wring from him a confession that such payments were made to him for voting for LORIMER—that is what the combination sought to show—but Beckemeyer has always stoutly denied, both then and up to the present time, that such was the fact.

Beckemeyer went before the Cook County grand jury three times; and it is important to distinguish what occurred on each of those occasions. The first time he remained only a moment or two; and denied meeting Wilson in St. Louis on July 15. That is all that occurred that morning. He was sent from the room, and immediately thereafter placed in the hands of an officer; Mr. Wayman's testimony is that he placed him under arrest because he had committed a crime in his presence. The crime he had committed for which he was summarily arrested was having committed perjury in denying he had been in St. Louis on July 15, 1909. Beckemeyer was placed immediately in custody for what? He was not lodged in jail; he was placed in the hands of an officer who was working in connection with the State's attorney's office, a sympathetic officer, and he was instructed to "treat him right."

The officer testifies that he understood by that remark that he was to cooperate with the State's attorney's office in inducing Beckemeyer to talk. The officer took him to lunch. He did not take him to jail, but he took him to a hotel. Before they reached the hotel they had visited two or three drinking places and indulged freely. Beckemeyer was nervous and anxious and alarmed. Of course he was. He knew he was guilty of accepting jack-pot money, and was in terror of what might follow as a result, and he became weak and cowardly. He craved stimulation, and the officer allowed him to go to saloons, and drank with him, and drank with him freely, but when his friend Welch, who had accompanied him from home, attempted to speak with him, he was not permitted to do so. He was just as thoroughly cut off from the outside world and as completely under the control of that officer as though he had been shut up in a prison cell.

What was the second turn? He had taken luncheon with this officer; he had not been permitted to talk with Welch; he was tormented with his guilty conscience; he had an abnormal craving for drink and had been allowed to have it; and his strength and courage were stimulated by the use of liquor. He returned to the office, and Officer Keeley, who had him in charge, reported to Mr. Arnold, assistant State's attorney:

This fellow is going to talk; he is awful anxious to tell something. So he says, "All right." Then, about 3 o'clock that afternoon, or 3.30, Arnold came out and we were stationed around the door of the grand-jury room. We were told to keep the reporters away from that door or from that room.

What occurred? Mr. Beckemeyer tells in his testimony:

Mr. BECKEMEYER. After sitting around there an hour or two I sent for Mr. Arnold and told him that if he would get Mr. Wayman I would make a complete statement of all I knew about the matter; that I was getting rather tired of keeping it myself.

Mr. HEALY. That was about how long after your talk with Arnold—that is, your second talk?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. It was getting along toward 4 o'clock by that time.

Mr. HEALY. Had anybody talked with you in the meantime and tried to induce you to tell what you knew?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir.

Mr. HEALY. Had any pressure of any sort been exerted upon you?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. There had not.

Mr. HEALY. Had you in the meantime, between the first talk with Arnold after the noon adjournment and the time when you sent that word to him, imbided any additional liquor?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I had not.

Mr. HEALY. What did Arnold say when you sent him that message?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. We immediately went and hunted up Mr. Wayman.

Mr. HEALY. Where did you go, and what happened; what was said, and who was present?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. We discussed——

Mr. HEALY. By "we," whom do you mean?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Mr. Wayman, Mr. Arnold, and myself.

Mr. HEALY. Was anybody else present?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Nobody else.

Mr. HEALY. What was your talk?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. I told them that I had about made up my mind to make a complete clean breast of all I knew about the affair; and I asked them then about—I was worried some at that time about the possibility of indictments being found in St. Louis against some of us, and I asked him at that time whether he controlled that situation.

Mr. HEALY. When you say you asked "him," whom do you mean?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Mr. Wayman; and he and I discussed that feature awhile, as to whether they had jurisdiction of any matter of that kind.

Mr. HEALY. You mean whether they had jurisdiction in St. Louis?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir. Then we discussed whether an immunity order in Cook County would be a bar in Sangamon County.

Mr. HEALY. A bar to what?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. A bar to a prosecution in Sangamon County. After discussing that feature—the statute expressly provides about that—we discussed whether that statute was a valid statute or not; and after discussing that, Mr. Wayman wrote out an immunity order, and I took it and threw it in the wastebasket and gave him a complete statement and told him I did not want the order at all.

That is the first interview with Wayman.

Mr. HEALY. Did the State's attorney, Mr. Wayman, indicate to you at that time that you would not be prosecuted if you appeared before the grand jury and in your testimony implicated yourself, perhaps, in some legislative corruption?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. He did; yes, sir.

Mr. HEALY. And that assurance and promise was given by the State's attorney of Cook County?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. It was; yes, sir.

I call your attention to Mr. Wayman's testimony of what occurred after that promise had been given him. Certainly no one can question that. He says in his testimony:

Beckemeyer began by saying, "I am in a hell of a fix."

Mr. MARBLE. Did you agree with him?

Mr. WAYMAN. I said, "Nobody knows that any better than I do." He said, "I got off the Illinois Central train this morning with the full intention of coming to your office and telling all about this, but my nerve failed me."

He talked about his family. He said, "I thought I could get away from this, but," he said, "the State of Illinois is a damn sight bigger than Beckemyer, of Carlyle." I said that I was glad that one man recognized that. He said, "I am a lawyer, and I know my rights. I want to know what there is to this business in St. Louis." I said, "If you are a lawyer, you know that whatever you did there, you committed no crime in St. Louis that could be punished in the State of Illinois."

He talked also about Sangamon County. He did not want to be involved in Cook County and Sangamon County both. He said, "Can I rely on you?" I said, "If you have any doubt of me, I will go before the grand jury and state what your situation is in the presence of the 23 grand jurors." I said, "You have committed perjury and you will be indicted." He said, "Is it too late to save myself from that? I have a wife and family at home." I said, "You can tell the truth before the grand jury and purge yourself of the indictment."

Then he wanted Mr. Wayman to write an order of immunity for his part of the transaction if he would testify.

Mr. Wayman asked him what the character of his evidence would be.

He said that he had received the $900 at St. Louis from Wilson, and that prior to that time, the date of which he could not fix, he received a thousand dollars from Lee O'Neil Browne in St. Louis, "but now," he said, "boys, I do not want you to double-cross me."

They had more talk about the immunity.

Mr. Wayman testified:

I said, "We are not in the business of double-crossing anybody, and I will write an order as best I can now." I sat down and tried to write an order that I would offer in court. After I had written it I told him, "This order is not worth anything. As State's attorney I have control of the matter of allowing men to turn State's witnesses, but you can take this order if you want it." He took it and tore it up. He said, "I will take your word."

They had further conversation, and Beckemeyer said:

You fellows have got it on me.

Mr. Wayman further testified:

He said another thing. That was, "After I testified that I was not in St. Louis, and Bob Wilson went in there, I asked him when he came out if he told the grand jurors that I was in St. Louis, and he said, 'Yes,' and I called him an opprobrious name—which I will not mention here—and he said, 'I will be damned if I stand for the leaders of this gang getting away. I will tell the facts.'

"I walked him into the grand jury room, and he then testified."

The circumstances under which this came about were these: All of the men who had received money from Wilson in St. Louis were going to deny that they were there at the time named; but Wilson had registered at the Southern Hotel in St. Louis and the authorities knew he was there July 15, 1909, and he could but admit it, although he denied paying money to anyone. When Wilson disclosed the fact that they were there Mr. Beckemeyer made the remark to the State's attorney which has been quoted, and was immediately taken into the grand jury room where he told the story on the promise that he should receive immunity from punishment because of any offense that he had committed.

Mr. Wayman further testified:

Before the grand jury he testified he was at St. Louis that day and met Wilson and the other members who were there; that he got $900 from Wilson; that prior to that time he had met Browne—no; that prior to that time he had received a thousand dollars at St. Louis; had got it from the clerk of the hotel; that he received a message the day before he went to St. Louis, on Briggs House stationery, in handwriting that he thought was Browne's, but he was not sure about it, and it was signed in some anonymous way; that he went to St. Louis; that he got a package from the clerk of the hotel, and in the package was a thousand dollars, and he did not know what it was for. That was the substance of his testimony at 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the 5th.

That is the second time he went before the grand jury. He testified afterwards that the reason for making that statement about receiving the money from the clerk was that he did not want Lee O'Neil Browne's name to come into it as having paid him the money, and so he put up the subterfuge, but he admitted receiving the money.

Concerning an interview which followed in the evening in the State's attorney's office, Mr. Wayman stated:

In the evening Mr. Beckemeyer was in my office and he said, "Now, there is one thing I lied about up there again." He said, "I got that money from Browne and not the clerk of the hotel." I said, "Can you fix the date?". He said, "No; but it was after the 12th of June and before July 4."

The CHAIRMAN. That was a thousand dollars?

Mr. WAYMAN. Yes. When he went out of the office I telephoned to the district attorney's office in St. Louis and asked them to go to the Southern Hotel and get the register for June, 1909, and send an officer to my office with it; and on the morning of the 6th the officer appeared with the register, and on June 21 "L. O. Browne, Ottawa," was registered.

June 21 was the time this money was paid to Mr. Beckemeyer, and he was called before the grand jury the third time, the next afternoon, to correct his testimony, to tell the truth and let the whole matter come out.

His third appearance before the grand jury was on Friday, May 6, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and the statement that he had received the money from Browne at St. Louis, and not from the hotel clerk, was then made.

That is the last time that Mr. Beckemeyer ever appeared before that grand jury, and that is where the matter was left when he had completed his testimony before that body.

DISREPUTABLE TREATMENT OF BECKEMEYER.

Beckemeyer went out after testifying that afternoon a physical wreck. The man had been torn by the consciousness that he had received $1,900 from the corruption fund known as the jack pot; that his offense had been made public; that he had also been indicted for perjury; that his reputation had been blasted and his career ended. Added to this, his wife was ill in a hospital in East St. Louis and his children were being cared for among relatives. In this condition, still in the custody of an officer, he was taken from the courthouse and was permitted to drink when and as often as he would. The testimony of the officer in charge of Beckemeyer is that "when they left the criminal court building they went immediately to Cunningham's saloon, where they had a drink or two; then to another saloon, where there was more drinking, and then to the Illinois Athletic Club, where they dined, after which they went to the Union Depot, and then back to the Princess Theater. They were there only a short time when Beckemeyer wanted to leave, saying, "I am nervous and I want to get a drink"; they got the drink and returned to the theater, but Beckemeyer was so uneasy he could not remain. The officer said, "Can you not wait until the act is over?" and he said, "No; I can not stand it; I am nervous; I am all broke up." So they went out and returned a third time to the theater, remaining only about five minutes, went out and met Welch and went to the Kaiserhof, where Beckemeyer drank more whisky. The officer then took him to the Grand Pacific Hotel, where they settled down to hard drinking in the cafe. Beckemeyer seemed to have an unusual capacity to take liquor that night, calling for a drink every five minutes. At midnight the officer sent to the Briggs House for Beckemeyer's bag, because he thought it prudent to spend the night at the Grand Pacific.

But what happened? After midnight that officer, in charge of a prisoner and responsible for him, took him to a house of ill-fame, where both spent the balance of the night. That officer of the law from the State's attorney's office took that prisoner, as I say, to a disreputable place, and both of them remained there through the night, Beckemeyer in a gross state of intoxication, and the bills were all charged to Cook County and paid by Cook County. If any Senator is curious to know just what was done with this prisoner by an officer from the State's attorney's office of Cook County while in charge of him, let him read the record from pages 5691 to 5695.

Beckemeyer was a wreck the day before, and he was more of a wreck on the following morning; he was so utterly shattered that he had to have two drinks as soon as he was up to steady himself. According to the testimony of Officer Keeley, Beckemeyer could not remember to what he had testified the day before, and he wanted to see the State's attorney. He was evidently confused, but he was taken to the State's attorney's office, drinking more on the way. Before reaching there the liquor had braced him up, and he appreciated his situation; that he was in the hands of the Philistines. To all previously existing causes for mental anguish there was now added his previous night's experience and the fear that his family would be broken up as a result. What did he do before reaching the State's attorney's office? He begged the officer not to tell where he had spent the night. Is it to be supposed that that could be kept a secret? Not at all.

An interview followed between Mr. Beckemeyer and Mr. Wayman. What occurred at that meeting we know only so far as Mr. Wayman tells it. Mr. Beckemeyer says very little about it. But they both agree about one thing—that at that meeting he made this addition to his statement. He never swore to it before the grand jury. But there, when he knew that he was in the power of the State's attorney's office, an officer of which had taken him when a prisoner to a disreputable house, the knowledge of which incident, should it come to his wife, might wreck his domestic life, he made an additional statement. What was it? Referring to his interview of the day before, he testified:

Mr. HANECY. You said that one reason why you told Wayman what he wanted you to tell him—one of the large factors in that—was that your wife was very sick and at the hospital and you did not want to be indicted while she was in that condition.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes; I did.

Mr. HANECY. That is right, is it?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes.

Mr. HANECY. Your wife was sick, was she?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes.

Mr. HANECY. She was in the hospital?

If that was true at the previous meeting, what was his reason at this meeting, with this new record against him, and the knowledge of it in the possession of the officers of the State's attorney's office? Was ever such an inducement offered a man to go to any length to secure secrecy and immunity?

What did he do? He added nothing to his previous statement except he said that when Mr. Browne handed him the package he remarked, "Here is your Lorimer money." That is what he added to it under those conditions, and he never had made that addition up to that time, either to Mr. Wayman or the grand jury. Let us look at it. Senator JONES asks Mr. Wayman:

But does he convey in his testimony anywhere that he expected to get something for his Lorimer vote when he cast it?

Mr. WAYMAN. No; I do not believe he does. The grand-jury testimony here is as clear on that as my memory.

Going along, concerning that Saturday afternoon's conversation, when Mr. Beckemeyer had been brought in under the conditions I have described, Mr. Wayman quotes Beckemeyer as saying that when Mr. Browne handed Beckemeyer the thousand dollars Browne said to him, "Here is a thousand dollars. Here is your Lorimer money, and we can not make a distribution of the balance until something happens." Mr. Wayman added:

What that was Beckemeyer would not tell or did not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you repeat that, please?

I want the clear, discriminating minds of the good lawyers in this body to pass upon the value of this kind of testimony as to a casual conversation had two or three years before, and see how a trained mind like Mr. Wayman's will fail to remember with accuracy what was said. Here is the testimony that he gave:

Here is a thousand dollars. Here is your Lorimer money, and we can not make a distribution of the balance until something happens.

If that means anything, it means he was paying him Lorimer money and there was more Lorimer money to come to him, and he could not pay it to him until something happened.

That is where the matter was left by Mr. Wayman, an experienced, strong man with a well-trained mind. No argument was had with him about it. I had not quite understood the statement, and I simply said:

Will you repeat that, please?

Mr. WAYMAN. That Browne had said to him when he gave him the thousand dollars, "This is your Lorimer money, or for your vote for LORIMER"——

A new passage comes in there—

"or for your vote for LORIMER," and that the balance of the jack pot or the fund could not be distributed until something else was attended to; and that he had met Browne at Starved Rock—

And so forth.

How are we going to reconcile those two statements coming from a man like Wayman, with a trained mind, professing to testify as to a declaration of a prisoner before him under conditions such as have been described?

In the first statement he made the fund a Lorimer fund. In the second statement he made it a "jack-pot" fund that was going to be divided. We would call that loose testimony if it came from the ordinary witness who is brought into court. It can be interpreted only by what was brought out from this witness at a later time, to which I will call your attention.

Mr. Wayman says Mr. Beckemeyer at that time continued by saying:

That he had met Browne at Starved Rock on a trip he took down the canal prior to June 12, or just after June 12, in which Browne had made an appointment with him, and said, "I will meet you in St. Louis and hand you a package in a few days," or something like that.

A package!

Mr. MARBLE. It was after his grand-jury testimony he made these disclosures?

Mr. WAYMAN. He never made the disclosure before the grand jury that when he received the thousand dollars from Browne that Browne said it was for the Lorimer vote. He disclosed that immediately afterwards to me.

And he disclosed it under the conditions I have stated—when he had been brought into the office by Officer Keeley that morning.

Senator JONES. Did he tell you whether or not he had had an understanding with Browne before the vote that he should receive this money?

Mr. WAYMAN. No. He claimed he had not had an understanding. He claimed that both before the grand jury and to me.

Senator JONES. And he was not expecting it at all?

Mr. WAYMAN. No; but his supposition was that it was sort of understood that whatever there was in anything down there would be distributed, and they relied upon the integrity and honesty of their leader.

All referring to the jack-pot fund.

Let us look a little further and see whether this was Lorimer money or the jack-pot money. What Mr. Beckemeyer really did know was brought out by the fact that on May 2, the day the grand jury convened in Chicago, the Chicago Daily News, wanting to join the rest of the papers in getting information, wired to Mr. Beckemeyer to know if he would testify about certain things, and he answered:

No one ever talked to me about money for voting for LORIMER. I did it of my own free will and accord. I know nothing of a jack pot that was distributed, nor did I ever hear of it. I am willing to testify any place on this matter.

But when inquiry was made of Beckemeyer on the witness stand in relation to that matter, he said that the first part of the telegram was true, that no one ever did talk to him about money for voting for Mr. LORIMER; but in relation to the second portion, that he knew nothing of a jack pot, he said it was a lie, and he used this language.

The question was:

Mr. HANECY. So that one element in that telegram is true: "I know nothing of a jack pot that was distributed." Is that true?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. That at that time I knew nothing?

Mr. HANECY. You say, "I know nothing of a jack pot that was distributed."

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir; that is not true, because I did know about it at that time.

There we have the clear-cut distinction, and there can be no manner of mistake about Mr. Beckemeyer's testimony. There is not a word in the volumes of testimony we have taken to show that he ever confessed to having received money for voting for Senator LORIMER, however much the contrary impression has been spread broadcast through the United States.

Beckemeyer told all and more than he knew and had received immunity. There was nothing now that could be brought against him in the courts. He had secured immunity for his legislative offenses before the last interview, and at that time he got immunity in regard to the deplorable incident of the preceding night when he was out with the officer, so that he went home free and relieved. Whenever his presence was needed after that all the Tribune had to do was to ask him to go to Chicago, and he responded without subpœna to testify or for the purposes of consultation. They have been on good terms since. As a witness Mr. Beckemeyer was as indifferent, as far as the interests of Senator LORIMER were concerned, as any witness I have ever seen on the stand. He had evidently recovered from his anxiety and wanted to tell the truth, and I think, as a matter of fact, he did tell the truth, except as to that one expression extorted by the circumstances of that, to him, dreadful Saturday morning.

WHITE, LINK, AND BECKEMEYER IN COURT.

Having discussed the witnesses who were used to try to bolster up Charles A. White's statement that he was bribed, and to produce some fact that would give color to the statement that he had made, we must look for a few minutes at the result that followed.

Beckemeyer, Link, and White were witnesses in the Browne trial. The one important question in that prosecution was, "Did Browne bribe Charles A. White?" They told all they knew regarding the circumstances which I have examined. The verdict of the jury was that Lee O'Neil Browne did not bribe Charles A. White, and he was discharged from custody. Since that time the Senate has tried the same issue and reached the same conclusion.

Is it any wonder that the jury did not accept the story of Charles A. White, or that a majority of the Senate did not accept it, when it is remembered that he went to the legislature with the avowed purpose of getting something from "the interests," as he termed them; that he is by his own confession participator in a corrupt fund; that he has attempted to turn that fact to his own advantage by falsely connecting it in some way with the election of Senator LORIMER for the purpose of securing, through perjury, a still larger amount of money; that he spent $4,000 in six months in rapid living; that he deliberately concocted a plan to blackmail Senator LORIMER, in which he dismally failed; that he was treacherous to the best friend he had on earth; that he attempted to get money from Roger Sullivan on the plea of running for Congress; and that his "confession," so called, when made, was made to Senator LORIMER's most persistent political opponent, the Chicago Tribune, for a consideration of $3,500, besides which he received full living expenses for the year following?

There was no hope of support for this wicked story except through Link and Beckemeyer, both friendly to Wayman at that time. But they could not help, because the truth is that they knew nothing about any money having been paid to anyone for voting for Senator LORIMER. The matter stands on State's Attorney Wayman's testimony; and Wayman's own estimate of White's story, before the Tribune ever bought that production, was that he would make only a 20 per cent witness. And with White testifying as a 20 per cent witness in the presence of a jury in Illinois, Link and Beckemeyer also being called as witnesses, Lee O'Neil Browne was acquitted of the charge of having bribed White to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

WHITE'S STORY A PURE INVENTION.

But if that were not enough, go back and take White's own story, and see how he lies about the matter in attempting to make the case. In the story that he told to the Chicago Tribune he says:

On the night of Monday, May 24, 1909, after lounging about the lobby of the hotel, possibly having a walk for a little fresh air, in company with two of my friends from O'Fallon, the town in which I reside, my friends and I retired to my room, No. 133, in that historic old hotel, the St. Nicholas.

At the time covered by that description White was on his way from Chicago to Springfield. He had only one of his friends with him, having left the other in Chicago.

He says:

We sat about in the room and conversed about various questions, having an occasional drink served us.

He says the Yarbroughs were with him; that Mr. Browne telephoned him that he would like to see him; that about 30 minutes later Mr. Browne came to his room, spoke to the Yarbrough brothers; that he went to Mr. Browne's room; and there, he says, the bargain was made by which on the following day he was to vote for Mr. LORIMER in consideration of the payment of a thousand dollars; and he says this was the first time he heard of LORIMER as a candidate.

How does this correspond with the testimony of Homer E. Shaw, that reputable Democrat, the chairman of the committee that was organized in the legislature to keep Democrats from voting for Mr. LORIMER, who says that when he went to White, a week before that time, White told him he was going to vote for "BILL LORIMER" if he ever got the chance; and when Mr. Shaw argued the matter with him, and told him how detrimental it would be to his future prospects, and what his friends at home would think of him, White said he "did not care a damn" what his friends thought, he was going to vote for him. And that was a week before the time at which he says he was bought.

How does this correspond with the testimony of Mr. LORIMER? No man has ever dared to say that Mr. LORIMER is not a man of truth. On the contrary, he has an established reputation for veracity. Mr. LORIMER said he had an interview with Mr. White about a week or 10 days before that time, when White assured him he would be glad to vote for him. Mr. Browne also denies the whole interview White claims to have had with him. But White tries to bolster himself up with the statement that the Yarbrough brothers were there and that they saw Browne come in. This is absolutely impossible.

Both Sidney C. Yarbrough and Otis V. Yarbrough were brought before the committee, and both testified that they spent the night of May 24, 1909, in the room with Charles A. White in the St. Nicholas Hotel at Springfield, and were there when Lee O'Neil Browne entered the room and invited White to go to Browne's room, where the alleged interview with Browne was held. The production of these witnesses destroys the story of White. Why? Both claimed to be there. Both tell the same story. If only one was there, then both of these men lied, did they not? Of course they did. One was absent; therefore both did lie about the matter, because they could not be mistaken concerning it.

How do I know one was absent? Why, both the Yarbroughs testify that they went to Springfeld from East St. Louis on Monday, May 24, 1909, Sidney being positive that he went up on White's pass on the Illinois Traction, and Otis claiming that he probably went that day and met Sidney in the lobby of the St. Nicholas Hotel that evening about 9 or 10 o'clock.

Now, mark that, that they both went by separate conveyances and that they met about 10 o'clock in Springfield. Also mark that White has them "lounging about the lobby," and "taking a little fresh air" with him at the time they claim to be on their way to Springfield. All the evidence in this case shows that neither one of them had been in East St. Louis that day or that evening. Not only does Browne absolutely deny this story, but the evidence clearly establishes the fact that White and both the Yarbroughs were in Chicago all day Sunday, May 23, and Monday, May 24, 1909. They went up there on the preceding Saturday on one of their periodical sprees. They were there Saturday night; they were there all day Sunday. The testimony shows they visited a disreputable house, and spent that Sunday night in it, and it shows that they were all in Chicago on Monday, and that none of them left that city until 6 o'clock Monday night. Then it was that White and Otis Yarbrough took the 6 o'clock train, which was late, so that they did not reach Springfield until 11 o'clock and 41 minutes that night.

How do these established facts comport with White's story, that he had been lounging with these two friends after dinner that evening in the lobby of the St. Nicholas Hotel, in Springfield, going out and taking a little fresh air, coming in and going to his room with them and then having a few drinks, and of Mr. Browne coming in? The evidence can not be impeached, it can not be disputed, that neither of the Yarbroughs were in Springfield at the time fixed by all of them, and Sidney Yarbrough remained in Chicago and was not in Springfield at all. He did not leave Chicago until after supper on Tuesday night, May 25. There is not a particle of evidence in this case, aside from the corrupt statements of the Yarbroughs and White, that tends to establish the presence in Springfield of these men on the evening of May 24. This tale was invented by White and was incorporated into the jack-pot story for the purpose of sale or blackmail. It was upon that story, its falsity disclosed by circumstances such as I have depicted, that the prosecution of Browne was founded in the courts of Illinois, and he was acquitted; and it was upon White's story that the election of Mr. LORIMER was investigated, and the Senate acquitted him; and now a third trial is had; and it is upon such testimony that Members of this body are asked to say that the bargain with White was made and carried out.

The money received by White, Beckemeyer, and Link during that session was from a source entirely independent of the election of Mr. LORIMER. No witness except Charles A. White has ever claimed to the contrary, and even he admits that substantially one-half of the money he received came from the common jack-pot fund.

His bitterest enemies when testifying before this committee did not attempt to impute any knowledge of corruption to Senator LORIMER. Even Gov. Deneen was most careful, and took pains at the very outset, when discussing the jack pot, to particularly state: "I do not mean to imply now that I am speaking of Senator LORIMER in this matter."

If the right to a seat in this body is to be forfeited at any time when it is claimed that some member of the legislature from which he received his election had been corrupted in some other and separate matter, how many Senators think you would be here sitting in judgment upon the election of Senator LORIMER?

DANIEL W. HOLSTLAW.

The only other man whose testimony need be examined in connection with the claim of bribery in the election of Mr. LORIMER is Daniel W. Holstlaw, who was in no way shown to be connected with the jack pot, but a man who acted in his individual capacity, evidently, in securing for himself whatever advantage a dishonest man may secure when he becomes a member of the General Assembly of Illinois.

Mr. Holstlaw is a Democrat, a banker, a merchant, and a jobber. He is wealthy, he is penurious, and he is covetous—a man who wishes to maintain a good reputation, but whose love for money is such that in securing it the end too often justifies the means.

As a senator he was unwaveringly consistent, in that he voted for Mr. Stringer, I think, 94 times; at all events, substantially on every vote until the last one. But he was weary of the deadlock. He had large business interests to which he desired to return; it was not a small matter with him that the added expense of remaining in Springfield diminished his net income as a senator, inasmuch as he received no more salary if the session was long than if it was short. A month before the election was reached, at a time when the deadlock had continued three months, he went home and talked the situation over with his friends and supporters, among them being Mr. J. J. Bell, a Democrat, and Mr. John Eddings, a Republican, and he told the latter that in order to break the deadlock he would vote for Mr. LORIMER if the opportunity came to do so. At that time he stated to several others that if a Democrat could not be elected he intended to vote for some Republican rather than remain in Springfield very much longer, and added if such an opportunity came he should vote for Mr. LORIMER. His reason for taking that position may perhaps be found in the fact that Mr. J. B. Lewis, a resident of his district, editor of the Marion Democrat, had published an editorial advocating the election of a Republican by Democratic votes to defeat Hopkins. Mr. Lewis was a friend of Mr. Holstlaw and had personally requested him to support Mr. LORIMER if the time came when he could do so, and, coming as it did from a Democratic editor, who was publicly advocating such a solution of the situation. Holstlaw assured Mr. Lewis he would do so. He returned to Springfield with this purpose in his mind, that if in the chain of events it became possible to solve that problem by the election of a Republican he would support Mr. LORIMER. That he intended to do so is also evident from the testimony of Mr. Stringer, for whom Holstlaw had voted on more than 90 different occasions, that for two weeks before Mr. LORIMER'S election it had been understood, although Mr. Stringer was the Democratic candidate for the Senatorship, that the Democrats of both houses intended to support Mr. LORIMER. Everybody, Mr. Stringer says, knew that fact.

Not only that; it is shown by the testimony I have already read from Mr. Beckemeyer that on May 25, the day preceding Mr. LORIMER'S election, Holstlaw entered into an understanding with Mr. McCollum and Mr. Beckemeyer, the three representing the same senatorial district, that they would all stand together on that matter and vote for Mr. LORIMER the next day, and though Beckemeyer was wavering on the following morning, Holstlaw and McCollum refused to be moved. There the matter rested. He voted for Mr. LORIMER in pursuance of a purpose formed at least a month before the election, provided the opportunity offered.

A year later the White story was published, and Mr. Burke, State's attorney for Sangamon County, undertook to investigate its charges. He summoned Mr. White, Mr. Beckemeyer, Mr. Link, and others to appear before the grand jury then in session, and when he was thwarted in his efforts by Mr. Wayman, the State's attorney for Cook County, Mr. Burke then turned his attention to other matters and investigated the fish fund, so called. He also heard of a furniture deal in the legislature, in which a contract to furnish the statehouse with chairs and desks was to be given to a certain firm, and that that contract was secured by a promise of a rake-off to certain members of the legislature. In probing this question a letter fell into his hands written by Mr. Holstlaw and addressed to Mr. Knox, of Chicago, and dated January 12, 1912, saying:

JANUARY 12, 1910.

Mr. KNOX, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR SIR: It has been arranged that I should see you. Will it be convenient for you to meet me in Springfield Monday evening, say, about 8 o'clock. If so, wire or write me at my home (Iuka, Ill.). Must see you not later than above date.

Yours, respectfully, D. W. HOLSTLAW.

State's Attorney Burke issued a summons for Mr. Holstlaw, who went direct to Springfield from a religious convention, held at Baltimore, at which he was a delegate, to appear before the grand jury of Sangamon County. In his testimony he denied having written the letter. He was dismissed from the room and instantly placed under arrest, and an indictment was found against him for perjury in so swearing.

I wish that Senators might have seen Mr. Holstlaw when he testified and heard his description of his state of mind when he found himself under arrest charged with perjury. Fear got hold upon him and his strength deserted him. In his terror his memory was quickened, and he signified a desire to go back and correct his testimony, but met with no encouragement. The officer advised him to retain counsel, telling him he would need counsel, and, Mr. Holstlaw being of that opinion, the officer immediately put him in touch with the firm of Gillespie & Fitzgerald, of Springfield, whose services he retained. That night they arranged for his bail and for an interview with the State's attorney in the morning.

I think I never heard a more pitiful tale of mental anxiety than the testimony of Senator Holstlaw as he spoke of his condition during the long hours of the night that followed. He says in a plaintive way, "Of course, I could not sleep very much." He knew he had the promise of $1,500 from that furniture firm in consideration of his vote as a member of the commission having the authority to award contracts for refurnishing the statehouse. He knew that his corrupt action was to be made public and his agony was increased by the fact that he was liable to criminal prosecution for his offense. When morning came he had reached a determination to secure immunity against prosecution for his offense, and all his energies were directed to accomplish that end. Immunity was what he most desired of all things in the world. Immunity was spelled in capital letters in his mind, and he could think of nothing else. He says the first thing his counsel did that morning was to telephone to the State's attorney that he wanted an interview with him. He did not even wait until the State's attorney was in his office, but telephoned to his home and had Mr. Burke come to the office of Gillespie & Fitzgerald; there they advised the State's attorney that Holstlaw was honestly mistaken, not having remembered, in the first instance, that he had written the letter, and that they thought, in "fairness and justice," he ought to permit Holstlaw to go before the grand jury again and correct his statement and so avoid answering to the indictment. Mr. Burke's reply was that "he would not allow that; that he had the goods on this fellow, and that under no circumstances would he permit him to go before the grand jury unless he told the whole transaction; that is, the substance of it." The question was asked, "Did you tell that to Mr. Holstlaw?" and Mr. Fitzgerald answered "I did."

As I said before, Holstlaw's whole purpose at that time was to secure his own safety. He swears to this over and over again. He was impatient. He could think of only one thing, and that was to avoid prosecution. In accordance with Holstlaw's expressed wish Mr. Fitzgerald arranged with the State's attorney to prepare a statement by Holstlaw to be submitted to the State's attorney, which, if satisfactory, would be the basis for an order of immunity. Before this was prepared Mr. Fitzgerald had another interview with Mr. Burke, with whom he arranged more definitely the terms under which he was to secure that immunity for his client. He testifies:

Mr. HANECY. Was there any talk, before you presented the statement to Mr. Burke, about what Mr. Burke would do under the circumstances if the paper was satisfactory or if it was not satisfactory?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Prior to the time the statement was given to Mr. Burke I understood from him that he would grant immunity to Mr. Holstlaw from any matter that might be testified to before the grand jury and also would nolle the case that was pending.

Immunity "from any matter that might be testified to."

Mr. HANECY. The case that was pending against Holstlaw?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANECY. Did you understand that from what Mr. Burke had told you or from what somebody else had told you?

Mr. FITZGERALD. From what Mr. Burke had told me.

Mr. HANECY. Then Mr. Burke told you that if Mr. Holstlaw would make and sign a statement of what he knew, Mr. Burke would dismiss the indictment for perjury against him and would have an order of immunity granted by the court there releasing Mr. Holstlaw from any liability to prosecution or any penalties thereafter on account of anything that he might testify to in that statement or in any other place?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, sir; he did not say if he would sign a statement he would do that. He said that if Mr. Holstlaw would testify to the grand jury fully about any matters that he might have information upon, he would do that, and he asked that Mr. Holstlaw prepare a written statement.

Mr. HANECY. And this was the statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, sir.

The statement was prepared by Gillespie and Fitzgerald in the form of questions and answers, and was subsequently submitted to Mr. Burke. The statement covering the furniture transaction was as follows, and according to the testimony of Mr. Fitzgerald it was all that had been required in the agreement made between him and Mr. Burke in order to secure immunity for Holstlaw. That statement to that point I ask to have printed without reading.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF D. W. HOLSTLAW.

Q. What is you name?—A. D. W. Holstlaw.

Q. What is your age, residence, and occupation?—A. I am 61 years old; residence, Iuka, Ill.; my occupation is banking, farming, and shipper of live stock.

Q. You are a member of the General Assembly of Illinois?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And senator from the forty-second district, are you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. I understand that you want to make a statement of your connection with the purchase of furniture for the senate and house assembly rooms as a member of the committee appointed by the legislature for that purpose.—A. I do.

Q. This statement when made is to be submitted to the State's attorney, Sangamon County, as I understand?—A. That is what I understand.

Q. Who constituted the committee?—A. Secretary Rose is chairman and Representative Pierce is secretary, and Senator Pemberton and Representative J. O. S. Clark and myself were a part of the commission.

Q. You may state any conversation you may have had with your associates on the committee or any of them about whether you would get anything out of letting the contract for yourselves.—A. They both of them, Pemberton and Clark, both said that we would get something out of it.

Q. Did you afterwards have any conversation with Mr. Freyer or Mr. Johnson on the same subject; and if so, what was said between you and them on that subject?—A. Mr. Freyer first asked me what I would want. I think that was what he said. I can not hardly recall what he said to me. I do not know what I did say to that, but we never finished talking. But I ought to say—I do not know whether I told him or not; I think he asked me what I would want out of it, and I think I gave him an evasive answer, and I did not want to do anything of that kind; then when he got ready to go out he said, "You go ahead and fix it up with Mr. Johnson. Whatever he does is all right." That is all as I remember that he said.

Q. Did you afterwards agree with Mr. Johnson how much you were to have?—A. Yes.

Q. How much did Mr. Johnson agree to give you?—A. $1,500.

Q. When was it to be paid?—A. After the furniture was received.

Q. Did Mr. Johnson say anything to you on the subject of what he was paying anyone else on the committee; and if so, what did he say?—A. He said that was more than he was paying anybody else, and he said that, if I remember right, he said $1,000 was what he was going to give Clark and Pemberton.

Q. Did you have any talk with either Clark or Pemberton as to how much they were to receive?—A. I did not.

Q. Has anything ever been paid to you?—A. Not a cent.

Q. Now, is there any other fact that you can state in connection with this matter that you now recall without being questioned about it?—A. I do not think of anything else.

Yet immediately following what has already gone into the record there appeared in that statement the following, and it is upon this particular portion of the statement that it is claimed Mr. Holstlaw was guilty of receiving money for having voted for Mr. LORIMER.

I read the section referred to:

Q. You are a Democrat, are you not?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you vote for LORIMER for United States Senator?—A. I did.

Q. Before the voting came off was anything said to you about paying you anything for voting for LORIMER?—A. There was.

Q. Who talked to you on that subject, and what was said?—A. Senator Broderick, of Chicago. He said to me: "Mr. LORIMER is going to be elected to-morrow"—that is, as well as I remember the date—and he said: "There is $2,500 for you if you want to vote that way"; and the next morning I voted for him.

Q. Did you tell Mr. Broderick that you would vote for Mr. LORIMER?—A. I do not know whether I did or not, but I think I did.

How was this brought about? How did this get into that statement, in view of all the evidence which I have just been reviewing in this case? It appears that in the consultation between counsel and client, when all his statements were fully protected by the law, Holtslaw had insistently and persistently stated that he had no knowledge of any legislative corruption other than the furniture deal; and that was true, because it appears from evidence that can not be controverted that long before the evening on which it is claimed he met Broderick and agreed to vote for Mr. LORIMER—a month before—he had promised the editor of the Marion Democrat, Mr. Lewis, to vote for Mr. LORIMER. The following testimony of Mr. Fitzgerald shows that from the very beginning, however alarmed he was at his own situation, Holstlaw had asserted that fact. Listen to this testimony. Senator JOHNSTON questioned Mr. Fitzgerald as follows:

Did you ever hear of Holstlaw receiving any money from Broderick or being offered any until this examination in your office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, sir; he had denied that he knew anything about anything else.

Senator JOHNSTON. Denied it to you?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, sir; he had told me before, at the time I talked to Mr. Burke, when he said he would prepare a written statement, that he did not know anything about any legislative corruption other than the furniture transaction.

That being the case, how did this alleged confession get into the Holstlaw statement? The testimony of Mr. Fitzgerald has been quoted. But in answer to Senator FLETCHER Mr. Fitzgerald also testified as follows:

Did you also tell him, after your return to your office to prepare that statement, that it was necessary for that statement to be full and complete and to contain matter that would satisfy Mr. Burke?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I told him what Mr. Burke had stated about it; yes..

Mr. HANECY. So that after the first, second, and third interviews between you and Mr. Burke in relation to Mr. Holstlaw, and after you and Mr. Gillespie, your partner, got together with Mr. Holstlaw to prepare this paper dated May 28, 1910, and down to the time where you asked the last question relating to the furniture deal, on the bottom of the second typewritten page, you did not know of and never heard Senator LORIMER's name used in connection with the matters in any way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not remember whether I had two or three interviews with Mr. Burke before this time, but I had not heard LORIMER's name mentioned in any particular by Mr. Holstlaw in connection with the legislative matters at that time except to deny generally that he knew anything about any legislative corruption.

When examined concerning this incriminating portion of the statement Mr. Gillespie testified as follows, Mr. Hanecy asking him this question:

You knew that Mr. Holstlaw had denied, whenever the question was asked or suggested, or intimation made in connection with it, that there was any bribery or corruption or improper practices connected in any way with the election of United States Senator by the forty-sixth general assembly, did you not?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I knew he had denied it; yes, sir; up to that time.

Up to the point where he was asked if he voted for Mr. LORIMER and he said he did, nothing had been said relating to any corruption aside from the furniture deal.

Mr. Gillespie testified as follows:

Mr. HANECY. Up to that time—that is, the finishing of the questions and answers—down to and including the last line at the bottom of the second page and the answer on the top of the third page of this story, Mr. Holstlaw had denied that there was any other thing or any other matter that he had any knowledge of in the way of corruption or bribery or improper practices in or before or connected with the forty-sixth general assembly, did he not?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I think that is true, Judge.

Mr. HANECY. And he denied he knew anything about any corruption, bribery, or improper practices in the election of a United States Senator, did he not?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANECY. And you knew your partner, Mr. Fitzgerald, had had three interviews with State's Attorney Burke in relation to the Holstlaw immunity matter and the dismissal of the indictment against him?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I knew he had two up to that time.

Mr. HANECY. He said this forenoon that he had had three.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I do not remember about that. I knew what had been going on in the office anyway.

Mr. HANECY. You knew that Mr. Holstlaw had denied, whenever the question was asked or suggested, or intimation made in connection with it, that there was any bribery or corruption or improper practices connected in any way with the election of United States Senator by the forty-sixth general assembly, did you not?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I knew he had denied it; yes, sir; up to that time.

Again:

Mr. HANECY. So that the first time Senator LORIMER's name was ever connected by Holstlaw or anybody else in your office—you, or your partner, or the State's attorney—with bribery, or corruption, or improper practices in connection with the election of a Senator by the forty-sixth general assembly, was when it developed in your office when you were making this statement?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes, sir.

Holstlaw tried to dictate a statement but "appeared to have no capacity to do it, and Mr. Fitzgerald suggested that I ask him questions and examine him." That is Mr. Gillespie's testimony. Judge Hanecy said:

That is, Mr. Holstlaw did not in any way introduce the name of Senator LORIMER in anything that he said in the dictation, did he?

Mr. GILLESPIE. He said so very little—no; he did not do that.

CONDUCT OF HOLSTLAW'S ATTORNEY.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate, and I wish this Nation might know it, to the way that matter was inserted in the statement of Senator Holstlaw—the advantage that was taken by Mr. Gillespie when acting as counsel for Holstlaw.

The testimony of Mr. Gillespie himself indicates that he betrayed his client into making a statement which was not true and which he knew was not true; and at the same time he suppressed and kept out of it the statement that Holstlaw had made to him, that he intended to vote for Mr. LORIMER all the time; that the payment of money to him by Broderick was in no way an inducement for such vote; that it was his intention to vote for him in any event, which he also admits over and over again in his testimony. And yet Mr. Gillespie deliberately omitted that statement from the paper which was carried to the State's attorney and on which immunity was granted to his client. All that Mr. Gillespie could say in his testimony in justification of his action is the following:

Mr. GILLESPIE. My recollection is that I asked him if that was all he knew of legislative bribery, and he hesitated for a moment and then said, "No; it is not." And I then asked him to state anything else that he had omitted, and he proceeded then to make further statement about a transaction with Mr. Broderick, and after he had made a statement of what had occurred between him and Mr. Broderick I continued the questions and answers to the end.

Mr. HANECY. That is, just as soon as he got through telling that, you started in to ask questions?

He says that he made it just as Senator Holstlaw told him to make it. If that is true, he made Holstlaw confess that he had been bribed to vote for Senator LORIMER and was paid $2,500 for it, when he had been expressly told to the contrary by his client.

Senator JONES asked this question:

Before that, if you will allow me a moment, does not that statement indicate and almost state in terms that Mr. Holstlaw got $2,500 for voting for Senator LORIMER?

Mr. GILLESPIE. It states that he got $2,500.

Senator JONES. For voting for Senator LORIMER?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I do not remember the exact language.

Senator JONES. Mr. Holstlaw, in his statement, made these answers: "Q. Who talked to you on that subject and what was said?—A. Senator Broderick, of Chicago. He said to me, 'Mr. LORIMER is going to be elected to-morrow'—that is as well as I remember the date—and he said, 'There is $2,500 for you if you want to vote that way,' and the next morning I voted for him."

Now, did he not say to you before he had answered that question that this $2,500 was no consideration for his vote for LORIMER, and that he had decided to vote for him before Broderick said anything about money?

Mr. GILLESPIE. He said he had made up his mind to vote for LORIMER and he thought he might just as well get the money as not.

Senator JONES. He said that he had made up his mind to vote for him and he might just as well get the money?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes, sir.

Senator JONES. Did he say to you in that conversation that he told Broderick that he had decided to vote for LORIMER?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I do not think he told me he had said that to Broderick.

Senator JONES. Why did you not put that statement in in that way?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Because he did not answer it that way when the questions were asked him. I asked him questions and he answered them.

Senator JONES. When you heard him answer that way you did not call his attention to his former statement in reference to it?

Mr. GILLESPIE. No; I did not change his statement in one particular.

The CHAIRMAN. And still you understood from what he had previously told you that the payment of that money was not an inducement to vote for LORIMER, but he intended to vote for him in any event?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes, sir; he stated he had intended to vote for Mr. LORIMER and he thought he might just as well get the money as not.

Senator JONES. But he gave you the impression that the money was no inducement to him to vote for LORIMER?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes; just as I have stated.

Senator JONES. Well, why did you not suggest that that statement go in?

Mr. GILLESPIE. I did not undertake to control his statement in any particular.

Mr. HANECY. If you saw that he was not stating it just as he had stated it to you——

Mr. GILLESPIE. If he could have dictated the statement, we would have permitted him to dictate his own statement. When we found he could not do that, we examined him as I have stated.

Senator JONES. But acting as his attorneys there, you did not deem it of importance to suggest to him that the language he expressed did not correctly state what he had before expressed to you?

Mr. GILLESPIE. No; I did not consider it of any importance.

Think of it! In that paper was a confession, signed by Holstlaw, that he was guilty of a felony, and the counsel he had employed to protect him testifies that he did not consider it of any importance! Yet that so-called confession in that statement is the only evidence in this case upon which can be predicated any kind of a claim that Holstlaw voted for Senator LORIMER because of improper influences. He himself has testified repeatedly that he did not do so. Everyone knew for a month before that time he would vote for Mr. LORIMER. It was arranged between him and his associates from his district the day before the election, and before his talk with Broderick is claimed to have been had, that they would vote for Senator LORIMER. He testified to this in the Broderick trial; he so testified before this committee, and he told this to his counsel; yet Mr. Gillespie permitted this "confession" to go into the statement, although he had been informed by Holstlaw as to just what the facts were. Judge Hanecy put this further question:

Mr. HANECY. You knew, did you not, as a lawyer, and you know now, that that language conveys to the reader that there was a bargain between Holstlaw and Broderick—that Holstlaw was to vote for Mr. LORIMER, and that Broderick was to give Holstlaw, for voting for LORIMER, $2,500?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes; that is the statement.

Mr. HANECY. You knew that that is what that language would convey to anybody who did not know the fact otherwise, did you not?

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes; of course.

This occurred at a time when public sentiment had been aroused by the publication of the White story, when investigations of every character were in progress in Chicago and in Springfield. Every man guilty of any kind of wrong-doing feared detection. Every man who could bring any evidence to bear on this question seemed anxious to do it. The public was demanding accusations against LORIMER. Immunity was the one thought filling the mind of Senator Holstlaw, and he was so mentally perturbed that morning that I think the man did not half comprehend what he was doing. Nor do I think he much cared what went into that statement, if by signing it he was sure of securing immunity from prosecution for his offense and of being discharged from arrest.

According to Mr. Gillespie's testimony, Holstlaw mentioned receiving $2,500 from Broderick, and while asserting that it had nothing to do with his vote for LORIMER, he put out that weak story, that he thought he might as well have the money. In his evidence in the Broderick case—the Broderick case was a prosecution on an indictment against Broderick for bribing Holstlaw to vote for Senator LORIMER—he told precisely the same story that he told before this committee.

Speaking of Broderick, in his testimony he says that on the evening of May 25—

He was standing out in front of the St. Nick, and I happened to step out, and we were talking, and he said, "Senator LORIMER will be elected to-morrow." I said, "I think so, and I am going to vote for him." He said, "You are?" I said, "Yes, sir." He said, "If you want to vote that way, there is $2,500 for you."

Mr. MARBLE. What did you say?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I did not say a word.

Referring to what he claims Broderick then said, Holstlaw further testified:

I did not think very much about that, because I intended to vote for LORIMER anyway, and that did not have any influence whatever with me—and in response to the following question:

Mr. MARBLE. You would have voted for Senator LORIMER if John Broderick had not spoken to you the night before?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I would, most assuredly.

It was a weak story, told doubtless to cover some transaction which has never been revealed. However that may be, it has not a corroborating circumstance in all the volumes of testimony, but is disproved by testimony which is unanswerable.

The so-called "confession" which was incorporated in the statement that went to the State's attorney of Sangamon County was the direct work of Gillespie and Fitzgerald, Holstlaw's attorneys. Gillespie had formerly been assistant to Attorney General Stead. Gov. Deneen had advised Gillespie not to take employment in the defense of any of the bribery cases, as there undoubtedly would be a legislative investigation, in which he might be employed, and had asked upon what terms he was with the attorney general.

Gillespie says:

The substance of the conversation was that there would be litigation growing out of it, and the matter would probably be inquired into by the legislature, and he suggested that I might be employed. In the conversation he asked me what my relations were with the attorney general, and I stated to him that they were friendly.

Further along Mr. Gillespie says:

On the day when Attorney General Stead made the motion in the Sangamon County Circuit Court—

That was the motion which the attorney general made to restrain Burke from investigating the White, Beckemeyer, and Link stories—

I happened to be in court, and he called me aside and asked me if I had had any connection with the defense of any of those cases or had been employed or spoken to by anybody. I stated to him that I had not. He stated to me that he did not know what his attitude would be, and asked me for the time being not to participate in the defense, and I stated to him that I would not at that time.

He held out until the Holstlaw matter came up. He then had a further conversation with the governor. Mr. Gillespie said:

I stated to the governor that Mr. Holstlaw had been indicted for perjury, and Mr. Fitzgerald had been retained to defend him, and that we were going to represent Holstlaw.

Mr. HEALY. What did the governor say about that?

Mr. GILLESPIE. He said that was all right, that he understood the attorney general was not going to participate.

It will be noted that this particular matter in no way connected itself with the jack-pot story, and that Gov. Deneen did not object to the employment of Gillespie and Fitzgerald in this matter, although he had asked them not to accept employment in the other matter. While it is denied by Gillespie that he was employed by the Chicago Tribune in the Holstlaw or any other matter growing out of the corruption, or the alleged corruption, of the legislature, it appears from the testimony of Basil D. Monroe, an attorney at Louisville, Ill., who was judge of Clay County court for eight years, and formerly connected with the attorney general's office, that Gillespie told him that he, Gillespie, got in for the Chicago Tribune through Gov. Deneen. The importance of this testimony——

Mr. BRADLEY. What is that man's name?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gillespie.

Mr. BRADLEY. Who is the man who said that?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Basil D. Monroe, a man who had been eight years the judge of his county. The testimony will be found at page 4749 and other pages following, if the Senator desires to find it. That testimony was:

Mr. HANECY. Did you have a talk with Mr. G. B. Gillespie, of the firm of Gillespie & Fitzgerald, about that time, and after Holstlaw signed that paper that you say you saw in the papers?

Mr. MONROE. Yes; I think I did.

Mr. HANECY. Where was that conversation?

Mr. MONROE. The conversation was in his office.

Mr. HANECY. In Mr. Gillespie's office?

Mr. MONROE. Yes.

Mr. HANECY. In Springfield?

Mr. MONROE. Yes.

Mr. HANECY. When was it with reference to the publication of the story or the day when Holstlaw had appeared before the grand jury of Sangamon County?

Mr. MONROE. I can not give the exact time of it. My recollection is it was just a few days after this statement of Holstlaw had been published in the papers.

Mr. HANECY. The statement of Holstlaw as to——

Mr. MONROE. His confession, in other words, about the deal that he had been into as to the furniture and other bribery charges.

Mr. HANECY. During the forty-sixth general assembly?

Mr. MONROE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANECY. Who was present at that conversation?

Mr. MONROE. There was nobody there but Mr. Gillespie and myself.

Mr. HANECY. What was that conversation?

Mr. MONROE. The conversation came about by Mr. Gillespie asking me if I was getting any business out of these bribery cases. In answer to that I told him that I was not. I said, "Are you getting any of it?" He said that he was getting into it, or something like that; that was the expression, that he was getting into the business.

Mr. HANECY. Proceed.

Mr. MONROE. I said, "How did you get in?" He said he got in for the Chicago Tribune, through Gov. Deneen. I said, "How did you come to get in that way?" He said that he had taken Mr. Holstlaw's confession, and that was about all that was said about it.

And there is another reputable witness to the same effect—Mr. William H. Dillman, a lawyer and banker, who lives at Louisville, Clay County, Ill. He is a personal and professional friend of Mr. Gillespie, and has employed Gillespie in important litigation. About two weeks after Holstlaw's story was published, Mr. Dillman called upon Mr. Gillespie in his office and his testimony as to what occurred on that occasion is as follows:

Mr. HANECY. Give us the substance of it as nearly as you can.

Mr. DILLMAN. Being friends, he said he had got in on this deal.

Mr. HANECY. What deal were you talking about?

Mr. DILLMAN. He was referring to the scandal that had come out; that he had gotten employment as a lawyer; and that Mr. Holstlaw had made his confession to him.

Mr. HANECY. Did he say anything about who wrote the paper?

Mr. DILLMAN. I do not recall that he did.

Mr. HANECY. What did he say about the person by whom, or the company by whom he was employed?

Mr. DILLMAN. What did he say about that?

Mr. HANECY. Yes.

Mr. DILLMAN. Nothing in particular that I can recall.

Mr. HANECY. What did he say in general, Mr. Dillman?

Mr. DILLMAN. He said he was just employed by this Chicago paper.

Mr. HANECY. The Chicago Tribune?

Mr. DILLMAN. Yes, sir; to get evidence along that line.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. HANECY. Was anything said by you or Mr. Gillespie about the story or the paper that was signed by Holstlaw and given to Mr. Burke, the State's attorney, of Sangamon County?

Mr. DILLMAN. I do not recall anything particular about a paper. He just simply remarked that he had gotten Senator Holstlaw to confess, or rather, had advised him to confess.

There we have the situation! It needs no comment! Any person who reads the testimony of Gillespie as to the manner in which that so-called "confession" made its way into that statement which was given to the State's attorney of Sangamon County will grasp the situation. There sat Lawyer Gillespie in conference with his terror-stricken client, who had placed his safety and interests in his keeping, arranging a most vital matter. He had full knowledge that his client, who was making that statement, claimed and had stated to him that he had not been corrupted to vote for Mr. LORIMER, asserting that he had never received money because of that act, and yet that attorney, professing to act for his client, deliberately propounded questions and permitted answers which when placed in that statement constituted a confession of a felony which he knew from Holstlaw's statement to him had no foundation.

And this so-called "confession," produced and incorporated in that statement in that way and under those circumstances, furnishes the only foundation there is for claiming that Holstlaw received money for voting for Senator LORIMER.

It is a remarkable circumstance that almost immediately after the perpetration of this great wrong by Mr. Gillespie his relations to the Chicago Tribune should have been revealed through the witness Monroe and Dillman, reputable citizens of Illinois, both lawyers and both friends——

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LORIMER. I merely wish to add right there that Mr. Dillman and Judge Monroe came into my office in the Senate Office Building on the morning of the day that they testified before the committee and pleaded with me to go to you and ask you to excuse them as witnesses, because the testimony that they would give against Mr. Gillespie, who was their warm personal friend, would result in his disbarment in Illinois if they were compelled to make the statement.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Not only that, but Mr. Gillespie admits that there were publications in some of the newspapers in Illinois to the effect that he represented the Chicago Tribune; and he mentions, if I remember correctly, the Herald and the Springfield Record.

I have only to say that to permit a "confession" of the character of that introduced by him in Mr. Holstlaw's statement to State's Attorney Burke, in the light of what he himself confesses was said to him by Mr. Holstlaw, was an inexcusable act, and if it be true that he was at that time in the employ of the Chicago Tribune, it is all the more open to condemnation. Yet that "confession," so called, has been used by the Chicago press to blacken Mr. LORIMER's character and to drive him out of public life.

There are some other circumstances in connection with this incident which are worthy of mention. The evidence clearly shows that the sum paid by Broderick to Holstlaw was not $2,500, but that it was $3,200, paid in two installments, but for the same purpose; and I should like to have any man connected with this case, who has heard any part of the testimony, account for that $700 if the $2,500 was paid him for voting for Mr. LORIMER.

All the evidence shows that there was a corrupt deal between Broderick and Holstlaw; but all the evidence goes to show that it was in no way connected with Mr. LORIMER; that it was an independent transaction on the part of Holstlaw and Broderick, just as the $1,500 deal was an independent transaction between Holstlaw and the furniture firm that was to refurnish the Illinois capitol.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that while we are discussing these important questions, which the Senate sitting in a judicial capacity must determine, there are, including the presiding officer, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], 10 Senators in their seats. I want this to go into the RECORD.

Continuing, let me say that the $3,200 was paid to Holstlaw by Mr. Broderick for some reason which neither revealed. It has been determined by the courts of Illinois that it was not paid to Holstlaw for voting for LORIMER. Let anybody who has heard the evidence account for the difference between $2,500 and $3,200. Mr. Holstlaw had not the nerve, liar that he was and bribe-taker that he was, to allege that it was for his vote for LORIMER. He says over and over again in his testimony that he does not know why it was given to him, and he made the weak, sickly, childish plea that he supposed it was a gift; but he felt some delicacy about it and did not like to mention it to his family.

What object could this man have in shielding LORIMER? None whatever. The evidence clearly shows that the only object in connecting LORIMER's name with this Holstlaw transaction was to satisfy the State's attorney of Sangamon County. The immunity order was secured within a few hours, and for that service this firm charged Mr. Holstlaw $500.

I shall take no further time upon this phase of the case, except to suggest one fact. We wanted to know why that money was paid to Holstlaw by Broderick? Why the latter received it? But all we found upon which to base a judgment was this: Holstlaw posed as what they call a "dry" on the liquor question. His district was composed of four counties. Marion, his home county, and Clay were dry counties, but the estimation in which he was held by his prohibition friends is demonstrated by the fact that he lost both of these counties by a majority of 5,556. He posed as a "dry" and he lived in a dry county, but he lost those counties by a majority of 5,556! In the "wet" counties of Effingham and Clinton the majorities he received were sufficiently large to overcome the loss in the other two counties and elect him to the State senate.

It is admitted by all that the liquor interests in all four counties were Mr. Holstlaw's strong supporters and succeeded in their purpose to send him to the Senate. When pressed to disclose what his election expenses amounted to, Mr. Holstlaw said, "Well, I can not tell." He was soft and sweet and plausible, but he could not tell what his expenses were. We asked him if they were $5,000. He replied, "Well, I do not think they were quite $5,000"; and when we pressed him, suggesting specific amounts, he did not think it was this or that, but when his examination ended the committee had the impression that his election expenses were from $3,000 to $3,500.

I am not attempting to account for the money paid him except, as the Quakers say, it was borne in upon us that he was reimbursed for his election expenses, the money having come through John Broderick, who for 17 or 18 years has been the proprietor of a saloon in Chicago.

As showing the influence of that Chicago combination that united in the undertaking to drive Mr. LORIMER from the Senate, I wish that Senators who are present would look at the Chicago Sunday Tribune containing a picture of Mr. Holstlaw; columns and pages are given up to this matter, a full discussion of the wonderful disclosures that had been made, and with headlines like this:

ONE MORE SAYS HE WAS BRIBED FOR LORIMER. HOLSTLAW CONFESSES HE TOOK $2,500 TO CAST THE VOTE "RIGHT"—

The word "right" being put in quotation marks—

NAMES JOHN BRODERICK.

TRUE BILL ALSO RETURNED FOR PEMBERTON, JOSEPH S. CLARK—

And so forth.

There is the use that was made of the work of Gillespie and Fitzgerald in preparing that statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to suggest another fact that is significant. Gillespie charged $500 for his valuable services in preparing that confession. He collected only $350 and never called on Holstlaw for the balance. I merely suggest that to the Senator as showing, to my mind at least, that he was receiving pay from some other source.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. And before this committee, Mr. Fitzgerald said that they "did not have sense enough to charge larger fees," and that they ought to have charged $2,500, in consideration of the value of their work.

From an examination of the evidence to which I have called attention it can not be successfully maintained that Beckemeyer, Link, or Holstlaw ever received a dollar for voting for Mr. LORIMER or that they had any knowledge or suspicion that money was paid to any other person for that purpose. The case as made before the Burrows committee rested wholly upon the testimony of Charles A. White, and the case as made before this committee rests wholly upon the testimony of Charles A. White. Unless the payment to him of $1,000 by Lee O'Neil Browne differs in character from the payment of the same amount at practically the same time by Browne to Link and Beckemeyer, there is absolutely nothing on which to base the claim that bribery was used in the election of Senator LORIMER. And I think I have demonstrated beyond all question that the only circumstance upon which can be based any claim that Holstlaw received money because of his vote for Senator LORIMER is the so-called "confession," wholly without foundation and wickedly allowed to go into his statement prepared under the direction of his counsel, Mr. Gillespie, upon which to obtain immunity in the courts of Sangamon County.

NO CORRUPTION FUND WAS RAISED TO AID MR. LORIMER'S ELECTION.

Mr. President, I had intended at this time, having disposed of the old case, to take up the question of the newly discovered evidence upon which the case was reopened and sent to this committee for investigation and to inquire whether there was in fact any fund raised by or through Edward Hines for the purpose of in any way influencing the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States. It will take considerable time to do so. The report of the committee upon that subject, which was drafted by myself, seems to me to be a clear and concise statement of the facts, and I ask permission to insert at this point as a part of my remarks the report of the committee bearing upon that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WAS SUCH A FUND RAISED?

After the most searching inquiry the committee is unable to find any evidence that any sum of money was raised or contributed by Mr. Hines, or through his suggestion, or with his knowledge, to be used corruptly in securing the election of Mr. LORIMER as a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, or that Mr. Hines participated in any corrupt practices of any nature in connection with such election, nor can the committee find that any such fund was raised by any person or persons to be so used. The committee goes further and reports that it finds no evidence that any such fund was ever contemplated by Mr. Hines, or suggested to him by any of the gentlemen with whom he conferred before the election of Mr. LORIMER regarding the election of a Senator of the United States from the State of Illinois, and in fact there is no proof that Mr. Hines raised or furnished or spent improperly any money to aid in the election of Mr. LORIMER.

MR. HINES'S INTEREST IN THE ELECTION.

In connection with this finding the committee thought best to incorporate at this point a statement of what the evidence discloses regarding the activities of Mr. Hines in connection with the election of Mr. LORIMER.

While Mr. Hines has had a general acquaintance with Mr. LORIMER covering about 19 years, he has never had any business relations with him, nor has Senator LORIMER been the owner of stock in any corporation in which Mr. Hines has been interested; and although Mr. Hines was a resident of Mr. LORIMER's congressional district about nine years, he never took any interest in the political fortunes of the latter, beyond voting for him, except in the year 1906, when horses and wagons of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. were loaned to the Lorimer committee for a street parade, and Mr. Hines secured the signatures of 25 or 30 business men to a circular which was sent out to voters, showing Mr. LORIMER to be a protectionist, and the value of his work in favor of deep waterways. Mr. Hines does not remember whether he paid for the printing of these circulars or not; but if so, that is the only contribution ever made by him or any of the companies with which he was connected to any campaign fund to aid Mr. LORIMER at any time.

A major portion of the winter and spring of 1909, during which the Legislature of Illinois was in deadlock over the election of a Senator, Mr. Hines spent in Washington, representing the interests of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, in connection with the tariff legislation then under consideration. He did not visit Springfield during the senatorial contest, and had not been in that city for at least five years prior to his appearance as a witness before the Helm committee in the spring of 1911.

Mr. Hines apparently had no interest in the senatorial contest, and according to the evidence did nothing in connection therewith until the 1st of February, 1909, when, at the request of Mr. Hibbard, of the firm of Hibbard, Spencer & Bartlett, hardware dealers in Chicago, a codirector with Mr. Hines on the Continental National Bank board, he telegraphed Mr. LORIMER, suggesting the candidacy of Mr. A. C. Bartlett, and followed this telegram by a letter, in which he said:

"Mr. Hibbard came to me this morning about the candidacy of Mr. A. C. Bartlett. * * * I feel it might be good policy to nominate a man of this kind, if you have not committed yourself elsewhere. * * * Probably you have already committed yourself along other lines."

In response to this, some time prior to the 1st of April, Mr. LORIMER told Mr. Hines that the different factions could not, apparently, unite on Mr. Bartlett.

During the next two months, from February 1 to April 1, 1909, Mr. Hines, as representative of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, looking after tariff legislation in Washington, was much occupied and paid no attention to the Illinois situation. In this work he was brought frequently into contact with Senators Aldrich and PENROSE, members of the Senate Committee on Finance, which was then conducting hearings in connection with the tariff schedules.

The legislative deadlock in Illinois naturally became a topic of conversation between them and was discussed first as a matter of political gossip; then as the situation developed, the probability of the deadlock being broken was often discussed. Early in the month of April Senator PENROSE sent for Mr. Hines and asked him if he knew the situation or could find out whether the legislature was liable to adjourn without electing a Senator; Mr. Hines replied that he did not know but would try to find out.

To this end Mr. Hines talked first with Congressmen Boutell and MADDEN, of Chicago, who told him they did not know the real situation, but that probably Congressman LORIMER could give him the information, whereupon he telephoned to Mr. LORIMER, who was in Chicago, and arranged to see him at his office upon his return to Washington; at the interview then had Mr. Hines told Congressman LORIMER that he was not personally interested in the matter, but that Senator PENROSE appeared to be much interested, and had asked him to make inquiries. Mr. LORIMER stated that the situation was indefinite; that he could not then say what it really was; but that he was going to Springfield the following night; would return to Washington in about a week and might then be able to speak with a better knowledge. Mr. Hines reported this conversation to Senator PENROSE.

A week or two later Mr. Hines again talked with Mr. LORIMER, who told him that the situation remained practically unchanged. Mr. Hines then inquired particularly as to the men under consideration, and Mr. LORIMER mentioned Congressmen MCKINLEY and Lowden, Judge Grosscup, and Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Hines reported this conversation, as well as what he heard from other sources regarding conditions in Illinois, to Senator PENROSE, as he met him in connection with the tariff matters.

About the last of April Senator PENROSE told Mr. Hines that Senator Aldrich would like to see him and went with him to Senator Aldrich's office, and in a conversation between them the general situation in Illinois, including the election of a Senator, was discussed, during which Mr. Hines stated that in his judgment Senator Hopkins could not be reelected, and he asked Senator Aldrich what the attitude of the President would be with reference to the matter. Senator Aldrich replied that the President was desirous that a Republican Senator should be elected in Illinois, and while he was naturally friendly to Senator Hopkins on account of the fact that the latter had received the primary nomination and perhaps for other reasons, he did not intend to take any active part in influencing the action of the legislature; that his wish was that a Republican should be elected, but that he would take no steps in furtherance of Senator Hopkins's candidacy or that of any other person.

A little later Mr. Hines had another interview with Mr. LORIMER, in which he asked him the direct question whether or not he was a candidate for the senatorship; and the latter replied that he was not, giving as the one important reason his great interest in the deep-waterway proposition which he felt he could best promote by remaining in the House. At that time Mr. LORIMER asked Mr. Hines if he had anyone to recommend for the position, and Mr. Hines suggested Congressman Boutell, which met the approval of Mr. LORIMER; but he could not tell how Mr. Boutell's name would be received. Mr. Hines told Senator PENROSE of this, who, in turn, had a talk with Mr. Boutell. About the same time Mr. Hines had an interview with Senator Aldrich regarding the attitude of the President toward the candidacy of Mr. Boutell, stating that an effort was being made to agree upon him as the successor of Senator Hopkins.

He asked Senator Aldrich if he would see the President, ascertain his attitude and advise him, and Senator Aldrich afterwards in another conversation reported to him that the President would be agreeable to Mr. Boutell's candidacy; that his anxiety was to have a Republican elected, and that he was satisfied with Mr. Boutell's Republicanism and would have no objection to his election. Mr. LORIMER'S candidacy was not suggested or discussed at that time. Mr. Hines told Mr. Boutell what he had done, and suggested to him that he see the President. Mr. Boutell did so, and also wrote letters to Chicago to ascertain how his candidacy would be regarded in Illinois; later he went to Chicago and after a careful investigation found that it would be impossible to get the different factions to unite on him; and Mr. Hines told Senator PENROSE of the failure of that undertaking.

As time passed the names of Messrs. Boutell, Lowden, and others mentioned in connection with this election, were in the progress of events eliminated, and Mr. Hines ultimately suggested to Senator PENROSE that Mr. LORIMER might be the man upon whom the different factions could unite, but because Mr. LORIMER had previously informed him that he preferred to remain in the House it was doubtful if he could be induced to enter the contest. Senator PENROSE also learned from other sources that Mr. LORIMER was the only available candidate.

Just previous to the election of Mr. LORIMER by the Legislature of the State of Illinois one or two interviews took place between Senator Aldrich and Mr. Hines regarding the candidacy of Mr. LORIMER and the attitude of the President with respect thereto. Regarding one of these, Senator Aldrich in his testimony says:

"Mr. Hines then told me that it was impossible to agree upon Mr. Boutell, and he thought there was a prospect—he said a very good prospect—of agreeing upon Mr. LORIMER; and he was anxious that I should find out the attitude of the President, the administration, toward Mr. LORIMER'S election, and tell him what it would be."

This the committee finds was at Senator Aldrich's committee room, late in the evening; that together they rode to Senator Aldrich's house, where Mr. Hines was left to await the return of Senator Aldrich from the White House, where he went to have a consultation with the President in relation to this matter. Senator Aldrich returned home from this interview about midnight, and in his testimony says:

"I told him that Mr. LORIMER'S candidacy would not be objectionable to the President. Then Mr. Hines asked me if I was willing to say that to anyone that he might suggest to inquire of me upon the subject; and I said that I was—that if I were asked in reference to the matter I should say that Mr. LORIMER'S candidacy would not be objectionable to the President."

Regarding the time of this interview, Senator Aldrich testifies:

"I know that it was prior to the election, and my impression is that Mr. Hines told me that he was to leave for Chicago either that day or the next day, or some time very near that."

And on this point Senator Aldrich's testimony is as follows:

"Senator KERN. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Hines at all about Gov. Deneen, or the part Gov. Deneen was to take in the contest?

"Senator ALDRICH. I think at this conversation Gov. Deneen's name was mentioned by Mr. Hines; not by me.

* * * * * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. What did he say about Deneen?

"Senator ALDRICH. My recollection is that Deneen was an important party to this arrangement, or agreement, upon a candidate, and that Deneen's attitude would be more or less influenced by knowing whether it would be agreeable to the President. That was my general impression with regard to that matter."

Both Senators Aldrich and PENROSE corroborate Mr. Hines in all essential features of his account of what took place leading up to and including his activities in behalf of Senator LORIMER.

Endeavoring to carry out what he understood to be the desire upon the part of Senator Aldrich and the administration, Mr. Hines went from the home of Senator Aldrich to the New Willard Hotel, from whence, sometime after midnight, he called up Congressman LORIMER on long-distance telephone at Springfield and gave him Senator Aldrich's message. Mr. LORIMER expressed some surprise at mention of the President's name, but Mr. Hines repeated the statement, telling him there was no question about it, as he had but then finished talking with Senator Aldrich, after the latter's return from a conference with the President at the White House, and that they would do all they could to assist in his election. Mr. LORIMER asked if Senator Aldrich would send him a telegram to that effect, and Mr. Hines assured him that he himself was authorized to send such a message, and Mr. LORIMER told him to send it. Mr. Hines then asked Congressman LORIMER if he would become a candidate, to which the latter replied:

"At this time I can not say; after I get the telegram I will give the matter consideration."

Mr. Hines accordingly sent the telegram. Senator LORIMER testifies that this was the first word he received from Mr. Hines concerning his candidacy, and Mr. Hines says it was the first time the subject was mentioned between them after the talk in April when Congressman LORIMER told him he would not be a candidate for the senatorship. Senator LORIMER locates the date of this telegram between the 20th and 25th of May, and Mr. Hines puts the date May 23, 1909.

Mr. Hines testifies that matters ran on for a few days, and that Senator Aldrich again sent for him and urged him to go to Springfield and see the governor personally and impress upon his mind the importance to the administration of the election of a Republican, and if Mr. LORIMER could be elected to have him assist in accomplishing it. This was on the morning of May 25, 1909, and Mr. Hines left for Springfield via Chicago that afternoon.

While the committee find some confusion in the testimony on the question whether there were two interviews between Senator Aldrich and Mr. Hines regarding the election of Mr. LORIMER and the mission of Mr. Hines in connection therewith, they are of the opinion that Mr. Hines's memory is the more accurate, and that such was the case; but if, as Senator Aldrich thinks, there was but one interview, it must have been on the night of May 24, 1909, for before leaving Washington the following day, May 25, Mr. Hines sent the following telegrams to Mr. LORIMER, who was at Springfield:

"MAY 25, 1909.

"WILLIAM LORIMER,
"St. Nicholas Hotel, Springfield, Ill.:

"Aldrich authorizes governor calling him up telephone. Confirm my message; conference last night; governor requested cooperate bring about result; can bring message to-morrow."

"WASHINGTON, D. C., May 25.

"WILLIAM LORIMER,
"St. Nicholas Hotel, Springfield, Ill.:

"Leaving for Chicago to-day; can go direct to Springfield. Bring message confirming conference held last night, showing highest authorities want you elected before legislature adjourns. Important Republican Party Illinois politics have strong, experienced man, friendly to powers here, elected immediately; needed here now. Telegraph answer quick, duplicate, care limited train, Harrisburg depot."

In both of which messages, as will be observed, he refers to a conference held the night before.

These conferences between Mr. Hines and Senators Aldrich and PENROSE impressed Mr. Hines with the importance of the matters under discussion as well as the importance of his activities in connection with them. He understood that in the investigations and reports which he made to them he was carrying out their wishes, that in the end they had reached the conclusion that Mr. LORIMER was the only person upon whom the different factions of the legislature could unite, and they were anxious that he should not only consent to become a candidate but that he should use his best efforts to be elected. In these conferences Gov. Deneen's name had been mentioned as an important factor in the election of a Senator, and Mr. Hines understood, after his last interview with Senator Aldrich at the latter's house, that he was authorized to convey to Mr. LORIMER the wishes of the Senators named, the attitude of the President as to his candidacy, and to urge Gov. Deneen to aid in his election. The telegrams indicate his understanding of the situation and of his mission, and he understood that in carrying this message he was representing the gentlemen with whom he had been in conference, and that he was authorized to refer anyone wishing for further information as to their attitude or that of the President to Senator Aldrich.

Mr. Hines was very much impressed with the importance of his selection as the medium through whom this message was to be carried to Illinois, and he entered with zeal upon the undertaking.

The evidence indicates that Senators Aldrich and PENROSE were the only persons with whom Mr. Hines was working or cooperating in the effort to break the deadlock in the Illinois Legislature by the election of a Republican Senator; that the only real interest he had in the matter was aroused by his frequent interviews with those gentlemen; the evidence also shows that neither he nor they had any candidate whom they specially cared to have elected—any Republican would have been satisfactory, and their purpose was to discover some person upon whom the different factions in the legislature would unite, and to that end they called upon Mr. Hines for assistance. Concerning this, Senator PENROSE in his testimony says:

"If Mr. Hines had been staying at home and attending to his business in Chicago, and the tariff had not been up, and he had never seen me or a lot of people who were interested in politics night and day, I do not imagine he would ever have gotten interested in the senatorial fight."

Mr. Hines left Washington on May 25, 1909, and reached Chicago between 8 and 9 o'clock on the morning of May 26, 1909. It had been his intention to continue the journey to Springfield, in order, as he testified—

"to carry out the request made by Senator Aldrich and see the governor and see other leading Republicans, members of the legislature, to impress upon their minds the importance of trying to unite on some Republican as Senator from Illinois."

But upon reaching Chicago he was met at the station by Mr. Wiehe with a message from Mr. LORIMER to call the latter on the telephone from Chicago instead of continuing his journey to Springfield, as intended. Mr. Hines therefore proceeded at once to the Continental Commercial National Bank and from there put in a long-distance telephone call for Mr. LORIMER at Springfield. While waiting for this connection, he sent from the bank the following telegram:

CHICAGO, May 26, 1909.

WILLIAM LORIMER, Esq., Springfield, Ill.:

Just arrived; trying to get you telephone; Aldrich, PENROSE, and higher authority, as telephoned you from Washington, want you elected; authorized have governor others call Washington telephone; confirm this; can be there to-night.

EDWARD HINES.

Very soon thereafter Mr. LORIMER called him on the telephone and said:

"I would like to have you immediately call up Gov. Deneen on the long-distance telephone, and emphasize to him as strong as possible what you told me from Washington. * * * When you get through talking with Gov. Deneen, call me up on the telephone and let me know what he says."

Referring to this telephonic conversation with Mr. Hines, Senator LORIMER in his testimony says:

"I told him that the reason I did not want him to go to Springfield was that the governor was not friendly to my candidacy, and that if he came down to deliver the message it would be too late before he arrived, but probably if he delivered the message to him over the long-distance telephone it might have some influence with him. I had not any idea in the world that it would, but I feel when you are in a campaign you ought to do the last thing, and in his case it was the last thing."

Mr. Hines testified that he also called up Gov. Deneen from the bank and said, as he remembers the conversation:

"This is Mr. Edward Hines, at Chicago. I have just come in this morning on the limited train from Washington, and was on my way to Springfield to bring that message to you from Senator Aldrich and the President, urging upon you to do all you possibly can to assist in the election of a Senator at the earliest moment possible. They understand that Congressman LORIMER can be elected if you will assist."

Mr. Hines testified that the governor did not seem to recognize his voice at first, and there was some suggestion of calling Mr. Reynolds, president of the bank, to identify him, but that finally the governor appeared to recognize his voice and said that would be unnecessary, and, continuing his conversation, Mr. Hines said then to him, "How soon can you see Congressman LORIMER?" that the governor replied, "I will see him within 10 minutes;" and then Mr. Hines asked him the following question, "Can we rely on your assistance?" and understood the governor to say, "Yes."

In regard to this Gov. Deneen testified:

"Mr. Hines called me up and asked me whether I had received a message from the President—President Taft—in reference to Senator LORIMER. He stated that President Taft had sent a message to me to support Senator LORIMER, and asked me if I had received the message. I told him no. He said: "Well, President Taft has sent the message, and I intended to come down myself. I have just arrived, this morning, in Chicago;" and my best recollection is that he stated that his train was late; had a five-minutes' connection, and the Pennsylvania train had missed connections. But, in any event, he said that he had intended to come, and did not come; could not come; and he said President Taft had sent that message to me, and I would get it. I said: "Did President Taft send that message to me? Did he tell you?" He said, "No." I said, "That is a rather remarkable message to send." He said, "Well, he is to send it through Senator Aldrich." He said, "Of course, the President would not send a message to you on such a matter where it would become a public matter; but Senator Aldrich is to convey the message to you." I said, "Through whom?" He said, "Mr. George Reynolds, of the Continental Commercial Bank, will call up and deliver the message." I said, "Very well."

Gov. Deneen says he did not tell Mr. Hines that he would see Mr. LORIMER within a few minutes, or within 10 minutes, and says there was nothing in regard to calling Mr. Reynolds to identify his voice; that he was not sufficiently acquainted with him to recognize Mr. Hines's voice, and doubted personally whether Mr. Hines was telephoning.

While they differ regarding many things which it is claimed were said during this conversation, which is easily accounted for by the difficulty attending a long distance telephone conversation, they both agree that no reference whatever was made to money matters, and that Mr. Hines said nothing about going to Springfield and taking with him all the money that was necessary to bring about the election of Mr. LORIMER as testified by the witness Cook. Gov. Deneen testified that on May 26, 1909, he did not see or communicate in any way with Mr. LORIMER until after his election, when the latter called upon him about 2 o'clock.

On the contrary, Senator LORIMER testified that Gov. Deneen called him on the telephone on the morning of May 6, 1909, and said:

"That he had talked with Mr. Hines over the telephone, and that Mr. Hines had delivered a message to him to the effect that Senators PENROSE and Aldrich and the President were anxious that I should be elected."

And in answer to the question: "What response did you make," Senator LORIMER testified:

"I thanked him for it. I knew the interview Mr. Hines had had with the governor had had no influence with him."

And Senator LORIMER says in his testimony that the only reason he did not desire Mr. Hines to go to Springfield was because he could not reach there in time, he having concluded to allow his name to be presented that day, and he understood the only assistance Mr. Hines could render was to deliver the message; that the governor made no comment with reference to the message and in this respect testified. Mr. LORIMER testified:

"I thought the governor just delivered a message. I got an impression that the governor either felt that it was his duty to call me up and let me know, or that he had been requested to call me up and let me know, what had occurred."

Senator LORIMER further testified that up to the night of May 25, 1909, he had not been advised that the President or Senators Aldrich or PENROSE had authorized anyone to verify their support or their desire in regard to having a Republican elected. Senator LORIMER further testified that he got the impression from the way Gov. Deneen talked to him over the telephone on the morning of May 26, 1909, that he was—

"just doing what he regarded as a duty, or extending a courtesy to the person he had previously spoken to over the telephone.

"He did not commit himself, and I knew from the way he talked that the message had no influence over the governor."

Senator LORIMER testified to a subsequent conversation with Mr. Hines as follows:

"I talked with him over the telephone—quite a while after that—and told him the governor had told me of the message that he delivered to him. When I say 'quite a little while after that,' I mean it may have been 10 or 15 or 20 minutes."

After his telephonic conversation with Gov. Deneen from the Continental Commercial National Bank, Mr. Hines went to the Grand Pacific Hotel to meet Messrs. Cook and O'Brien upon a purely business matter, which meeting had been arranged by his subordinates, and while in Mr. Cook's room had a second conversation with Mr. LORIMER over the telephone, in which he said in substance:

"I have just talked with the governor, and he said he would see you immediately. The Congressman replied, 'He has already seen me.' I then said, 'Now, if I can do any good I will come down on the afternoon train.' He replied not to come down until he would telephone me. He said, 'If my name goes before the legislature to-day, you could not assist any in time to come here. If you could assist to-morrow, I will let you know late in the afternoon by telephone.'"

At this point the activities of Edward Hines in connection with the election of WILLIAM LORIMER ceased. He did not go to Springfield, and the only person whose action he attempted to influence was Gov. Deneen, and in doing that he simply undertook to deliver what he understood to be the message from Senators Aldrich and PENROSE.

The significant facts brought out by all the testimony upon the question of Mr. Hines's connection with Mr. LORIMER'S election are:

(a) That he had no special personal interest in the matter, and did not visit Springfield at any time during the session of the legislature.

(b) That he was not urging the candidacy of any particular person.

(c) That during the two months in which the situation in Illinois was discussed between him and Senators Aldrich and PENROSE the names of several men of reputation and character were considered and dropped, and the name of Mr. LORIMER was not mentioned between them as a candidate until three or four days before his election, and not until after his probable candidacy had been under discussion in Springfield and it was believed there that he would become a candidate. It was practically certain Hopkins could not be elected.

(d) That the only object entertained by Messrs. Aldrich and PENROSE was to have the deadlock broken and a Republican elected.

(e) That to accomplish this Mr. LORIMER was not objectionable as a candidate either to the President or to them, and various names had been tested and it was found that Mr. LORIMER could command more votes than any one considered.

(f) That Mr. Hines was authorized and requested to report these facts to Mr. LORIMER, Gov. Deneen, and other public men, and to refer to both Senators Aldrich and PENROSE as his authority.

(g) That it flattered Mr. Hines to be consulted by Senators Aldrich and PENROSE, and his sense of the importance of the matter was greatly enhanced when he knew that they had been in conference with the President, and that Mr. LORIMER'S candidacy would not be objectionable to him, and that to be intrusted with the responsibility of making known their wishes and explaining the attitude of the President to Gov. Deneen and to Mr. LORIMER was a great personal honor.

(h) That he believed when the election followed so closely these events that he had been instrumental in bringing it about and was correspondingly elated.

The only testimony before the committee that in any way connects the name of Edward Tilden with the alleged fund raised to aid in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER is incorporated in the statement reluctantly made by Mr. Funk when he says: "Mr. Hines said, 'Just send the money to Ed. Tilden.'" Not a witness has testified to any fact tending to establish the existence of such a fund or to Mr. Tilden's connection with any such fund. But the committee saw fit to summon Mr. Tilden as a witness, and in his testimony he denied with great emphasis any knowledge of the existence of such a fund, or having any connection with it, and stated that the first time he heard his name mentioned in that respect was when he read in the newspapers an account of Mr. Funk's testimony before the Helm committee at Springfield.

To further determine the question whether Mr. Hines had been a contributor to or had any part in it, and whether Mr. Tilden had received or disbursed the same, the committee employed the firm of Barrow, Wade, Guthrie & Co., certified public accountants of New York. Mr. Ritchie of that firm made an examination of the accounts of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. and all its subsidiary branches and of the companies controlled by it, including the North Wisconsin Lumber & Manufacturing Co.; Hayward Mercantile Co.; First National Bank, Hayward, Wis.; Mason State Bank, Mason; White River Lumber Co.; Iron River Lumber Co.; Virginia & Rainy Lake Co., covering the period from April 1, 1909, to December 31, 1909, as well as the personal books of Edward Hines for the year ending December 31, 1909, and reported to the committee as follows:

"(a) That there was no evidence of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. or any of its subsidiary or controlled companies having received or disbursed any moneys in connection with the election of Mr. WILLIAM LORIMER, on May 26, 1909, to the United States Senate from the State of Illinois.

"(b) That there was no evidence of Mr. Edward Hines as an individual having received or disbursed any moneys in connection with the aforesaid election.

"In order to ascertain whether or not Mr. Hines might have negotiated a loan from one or other of the banks in Chicago with which he was connected, or with which he had business relations, I visited the following banks and trust companies: Continental National Bank, Hibernian Banking Association, Fort Dearborn National Bank, Northern Trust Co., Corn Exchange National Bank, Metropolitan Trust & Savings Bank.

"At each of these banks I examined their record of notes discounted during the last week in May, 1909, and the first part of June, 1909.

"I am able to report, therefore, that at none of these banks, in the period under review, did Mr. Hines discount any note or notes, either as drawer or as indorser."

An examination was also made of the books of Mr. Edward Tilden, and after reciting the method of the same and the theory upon which it was conducted, Mr. Ritchie reported to the committee that—

"There was no evidence that Mr. Tilden had been custodian of the fund alleged to have been raised in connection with the election of Mr. WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate from the State of Illinois."

THE BURGESS-WIEHE INCIDENT.

The only other incident to which reference is made in the so-called newly discovered evidence tending to show the existence of a fund raised to aid in the election of Mr. LORIMER is that related by William M. Burgess, of Duluth, Minn., who testified that on the evening of March 8, 1911, he boarded the Winnipeg Flyer at Duluth at about 10 minutes past 7 o'clock to go to Virginia, Minn., a run of about two hours; that when he boarded the train he went to the smoking room of the sleeping car, where he remained until he reached his destination; that during that time the compartment was occupied by others as well as himself, among them Mr. C. F. Wiehe, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Cusson, Frederick J. Weyerhaeuser, Rudolph Weyerhaeuser, Mr. Harper, and Mr. McGowan, whom he described as a "young Canadian," and with whom he had some conversation. The testimony of Mr. Burgess indicates that all of these gentlemen were in the compartment "at various times during the trip," and that at some period of the ride, when only the witness, Mr. McGowan, and Mr. Wiehe were present, the conversation between himself and the latter drifted onto the subject of Mr. LORIMER'S election, concerning which the witness said:

"I remember making some remark regarding the election of Mr. LORIMER, and Mr. Wiehe asked me what I knew about Mr. LORIMER'S election, and I told him my knowledge consisted of information gained from the Duluth News-Tribune and the Duluth Evening Herald and the Chicago Examiner. And he made the remark that I did not know very damn much about it. * * * He said that Mr. LORIMER had not spent any of his own money for his election; but there was, as he called it, a jack pot raised for Mr. LORIMER'S election; and he made the remark—this remark he made at the finish of the conversation—he says: 'There was a jack pot raised for Mr. LORIMER'S election. I know what I am talking about, because I subscribed $10,000 to it myself.'"

And further:

"Mr. Wiehe said it was impossible to get anything of merit through the Illinois Legislature without the use of money."

Mr. Burgess, Mr. Wiehe, and Mr. McGowan were all absolute strangers to each other; they had never met before; had no introduction at that time, and were ignorant of each other's names. It was not until after reaching the hotel at Virginia that night that Mr. Burgess learned that the gentleman with whom he says he had this conversation was Mr. Wiehe, a brother-in-law of Edward Hines.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Wiehe denies with great positiveness that any such conversation as mentioned by Mr. Burgess was had between them, and denounced him as "an absolute liar when he makes the statement." He further testified that he had no conversation with Mr. Burgess regarding the Lorimer election, or about any jack pot or any other fund to be used in connection with such election, or concerning any contribution by him to such a fund, and that he did not have any specific conversation with Mr. Burgess.

The testimony shows that at the time of the alleged conversation Mr. Burgess sat diagonally across the compartment from Mr. Wiehe and that no conversation could have been had with him which others there would not have heard.

It is admitted that Charles McGowan did not leave the room during that ride; he testified, "I was there all the time" and heard every word that was said by everyone, and testified that nothing was said that he did not hear; he denies with positiveness the entire Burgess story, further testifying that there was no time during the entire trip when he, Mr. Wiehe, and Mr. Burgess were alone in that compartment, and that there was nothing whatever said about Mr. LORIMER'S election.

Mr. Cusson testified that he entered the smoking compartment about 20 minutes after the train left Duluth, and remained there until Virginia was reached; that Mr. Burgess, Mr. Johnson, Mr. F. E. Weyerhaeuser, Mr. Wiehe, and one or two or three strangers were in the compartment when he entered; that he sat between Mr. Wiehe and Mr. Weyerhaeuser on the leather couch; that Mr. Wiehe sat on his left and that Mr. Burgess sat in a chair directly to the right of the couch; that Mr. Wiehe remained in the smoking compartment possibly 15 minutes after his entrance, when he was called out by Mr. Hines, and that he did not again return to the compartment that night.

Mr. Cusson remembers that among other topics of conversation was the tariff and Canadian reciprocity, but that nothing was said about the election of Senator LORIMER, and he denies in detail the statements contained in the testimony of Mr. Burgess as to the LORIMER case; that smoking compartment soon after the train left Duluth; that Mr. Wiehe, and not to exceed 2 or 3 feet from Mr. Burgess.

Mr. Johnson, a most intelligent witness, testified that he entered the smoking compartment soon after the train left Duluth; that Mr Wiehe, he thinks, came in after he did; that he remained in the compartment during all the time Mr. Wiehe was there, and followed him when he went out, as he desired to discuss a matter of business with him; that during the time he was in the compartment nothing was said by either Mr. Wiehe or Mr. Burgess with respect to the election of Senator LORIMER, nor about the existence of a jack pot or any fund of $100,000 being raised for the election of Senator LORIMER, or about any other amount of money being raised to aid the election of Senator LORIMER, and that Mr. Wiehe did not say that he had contributed to any such fund; in short, he denied everything to which Mr. Burgess testified.

Mr. Price testified that upon entering the train he carried his grip to his berth and immediately went to the smoking compartment where he remained for perhaps half an hour, when he went out to look after his grip, and was gone just long enough to go to his seat in the other car and return; that he then remained in the smoking compartment until 10 or 15 minutes before the train reached Virginia; that when he went out to look after his grip Mr. Burgess, Mr. Johnson, and Mr. McGowan were in the smoking compartment, and he tells where and how they were sitting. He thinks Mr. Weyerhaeuser was sitting with Mr. Cusson immediately next to him, and that when he returned Mr. Wiehe had taken his seat, and that he was obliged to stand for some time and until Mr. Wiehe was called from the room by Mr. Hines. This is confirmed by Mr. McGowan, who testified that Mr. Wiehe was called out by Mr. Hines.

In his testimony Mr. Price tells of other subjects which were discussed, but says nothing was said by any person present regarding the election of Senator LORIMER, and denies everything that has been testified to by Mr. Burgess as having occurred on that occasion.

Mr. Harper, who was also present and observed those in the compartment, heard no such conversation.

Mr. Wiehe is not a talkative man. He appears rather cautious. It is not reasonable to suppose that he would declare to a stranger who happened to be in the same smoker on a railway train that he had contributed to a corruption fund which had been used in the election of a Senator from his State. He is not a light or foolish man, and the committee is unable to ignore his testimony and that of all the other persons in the smoker, aside from Mr. Burgess, and accept the latter as the only truthful one among them.

* * * * * * *

With the foregoing convincing array of evidence in denial of all the facts contained in Mr. Burgess's testimony, and in view of the improbability that a man of Mr. Wiehe's intelligence and business experience should, in a public place and to an utter stranger, have confessed to having part in an infamous proceeding, this committee can not do otherwise than discard the testimony of Mr. Burgess as proof of any facts alleged.

From the above it clearly appears that Edward Hines never so much as thought of raising a corruption fund to "put LORIMER over." In all that he did he was acting with the leaders of the party in Washington, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to secure the election of a Republican Senator from Illinois, and he was merely performing an errand when he communicated to Mr. LORIMER and to Gov. Deneen their thought in the matter. It is impossible to believe that Mr. Hines could have told Mr. Funk that "we put LORIMER over down at Springfield, but it cost us $100,000 to do it."

WHY THE FUNK STORY WAS NEVER USED WHERE ITS TRUTH COULD BE TESTED.

That brings us back to the Funk story and the uses to which it was put. That story, as I have said, was used as a newspaper asset, to create public sentiment, but never in any legal proceedings where its truth or falsity could be properly determined. Those who listened to the early part of my remarks will remember that I called attention to the fact that the publication of the White story was made on the morning of Saturday, April 30, 1910; that Mr. Funk rushed in with his story to Mr. Kohlsaat as early as Sunday, because on Monday morning, May 2, the Chicago Tribune had the "sawdust" editorial, which clearly showed that Mr. Kohlsaat, who is confessedly the man who conveyed that story to the editor of the Tribune, must have given it to him on that Sunday, the day following the publication of the White story.

Why has that story never been used in any legal proceedings? Simply because its custodians never have dared to submit it to a legal test. They never intended to submit it to a legal test. They never would have submitted it to a legal test had it not been that the Helm committee, a month after the Senate had finished the previous examination, compelled Mr. Kohlsaat to come before it, and insisted that he reveal the source of the information upon which he based the editorial of February 15, containing the inquiry, "Do we know all there is to be known concerning the $100,000 fund that was raised to pay for LORIMER'S votes?"

It was a most remarkable situation. What reason does Mr. Funk give for desiring to have it kept secret? Mr. Kohlsaat says it was communicated to him in confidence; he says that he communicated it to the editor of the Tribune in confidence; that he communicated it to the owner of the Daily News in confidence; that he communicated it to Col. Roosevelt in confidence; that he communicated it to Senator ROOT in confidence—everywhere in confidence. What was the reason? Simply because Clarence S. Funk would not permit it to be told publicly with his name as the authority for the statements it contained. Why would not Clarence S. Funk permit this to be done? In his testimony he says first—

I am afraid that nobody will believe that I am animated by any high moral principles in the matter, even if I can see my way clear to do it, because of my corporation affiliations.

A very good reason.

Secondly, he says:

I explained to him (Mr. Kohlsaat) that it would incur enmities for my company—

He being the general manager of the International Harvester Co.—

which had dealings with a great many other interests; and I feared that if we projected ourselves into the situation it would create hostilities and antagonisms toward the company which would take a long time to heal; and that in my consideration of the matter pro and con I had arrived at the conclusion that my duty to protect my company and my stockholders outweighed any duty I might have as a citizen, and that I was not willing to get into the matter at all.

No one can doubt that statement, coming, as it does, from Mr. Funk; but why was there any necessity for secrecy if it was the truth? He was afraid, as he says, that it would injure the International Harvester Co., and herein lies the true reason why that should be kept secret.

What had been the attitude of the company toward Mr. LORIMER? It is a conceded fact that the harvester company had long antagonized WILLIAM LORIMER and had an earnest desire to defeat him politically. It had been disappointed when he was elected; and Mr. Funk testifies that he saw in his election an increased power given to Mr. LORIMER that might be exercised upon the International Harvester Co.

THE INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO. INTERESTED.

Do you understand what the International Harvester Co. is? It is a corporation organized under the laws of New Jersey with a capital of what? One hundred and forty millions of dollars. It is one of the great trusts that have recently been mentioned in the newspapers as subject to prosecution under the provisions of the Sherman act. Its president, when he was before this committee, denied it as a fact, but admitted that the company had been charged with the corruption of legislatures in several States.

That company has a large board of directors—18 in number—divided between the East and the West. But the board of directors is not burdened, because the corporation has a voting trust, consisting of its president, Cyrus H. McCormick, Charles Deering, and George W. Perkins, which trust really controls the policy of the company and represents its entire stock at the annual election of directors.

Mr. Funk, the author of this story, is the general manager of that great trust, and he undoubtedly told the truth when he said that he did not want to draw attention to his company and produce antagonisms that might prove disastrous to its interests. For years that company has been trying to have closed that branch of the Chicago River which runs in front of its works, dividing the plant and separating the works from a great area of land which it owns. If that branch of the river was closed and made nonnavigable, 4 or 5 miles of territory occupied by manufacturing interests of vast importance lying beyond the Harvester plant could not be reached by boats. I do not know how long that contest has continued. I suspect the Senator from Illinois will tell us about it when he comes to address the Senate. But the fact was developed before the committee that the feeling entertained by that company toward Senator LORIMER was one of great opposition, simply because he had, as a Member of the House of Representatives, persistently opposed the closing of that navigable stream.

It is easy to understand why, as soon as Mr. LORIMER had been declared a Senator from the State of Illinois, Mr. Funk should have seen that his favor was to be sought rather than his enmity, and that he should go to Edward Hines—and Edward Hines says he did go to him—with the proposition that LORIMER must have been put to considerable expense and that the International Harvester Co. would be glad to contribute to that expense, and, incidentally, to ask for an introduction to Mr. LORIMER, whom he had never met. It was natural that Mr. Hines should go to LORIMER and ask him as to the amount of his expenses. It was just as natural when the Chicago Tribune, a year later, opened its batteries upon WILLIAM LORIMER and urged that he should be unseated that Mr. Funk should come forward, with all the power of that great corporation behind him, secretly, without bringing to bear upon his corporation the responsibility of his actions, and join the combination to oust Mr. LORIMER from the United States Senate. Did he do it? Did he have any reason to do it? Judge Hynes asked Funk this question:

Mr. HYNES. Did you apprehend that Senator LORIMER would be a more important factor in connection with your issue as to the opening or closing of the stream at Western Avenue, where your plant is, on the Chicago River, if he became a Senator than when he was a Member of the lower House?

Mr. FUNK. Yes; I think he would, naturally.

And he would not say that his interest was not excited with respect to the election of Senator LORIMER.

Mr. Funk further testified:

I had understood Senator LORIMER was the most active man in trying to put the thing through.

That is to deepen and widen the river.

Further, that Senator LORIMER was the most active and forceful opponent of closing the river, and that he was on the opposite side of the Harvester Co. in the controversy; that he had discussed and weighed the forces for and against that proposition, including Senator LORIMER.

There you have disclosed the attitude of Clarence S. Funk.

Now, how did these people come into this controversy and why did they come into it? And why did they want to keep their action secret? These questions interest me. Gov. Deneen, in his testimony, tells about the jack-pot story being brought to him by Mr. Keeley, of the Chicago Tribune. Did it in any way connect the International Harvester Co. with legislation? He said that the chief characteristic of the story was the jack pot; that it mentioned the senatorial election, but did not mention the Senator himself.

But in that story of Charles A. White was the statement that in connection with that jack pot as it existed in the legislature of 1909 he had been told by Browne on several occasions that had it not been for the veto of a certain bill by Gov. Deneen $35,000 more would have been added to the jack pot. Gov. Deneen thought he recognized senate bill 286, the corporation bill, as the one to which this reference was made.

When we come to examine the record it would seem that the Harvester Co. was interested in that bill. It was prepared by a committee composed of distinguished lawyers of Chicago, among whom was Mr. Bancroft, the general counsel for the Harvester Co., who, according to the testimony of President McCormick, would ordinarily, with Mr. Funk, look after the company's legislative matters.

Mr. Bancroft testifies that he was a member of the committee and that he assisted in drafting the bill; but he says, not the provisions that were vetoed, because he thought those provisions were put in by amendment. But in that I think I will be able to show he was mistaken. Let us look at the bill for a moment.

I read from a copy of the bill just as it was introduced into the legislature of Illinois. Section 31, being the disputed section, reads as follows:

Any corporation organized under the laws of this State may purchase, own, sell, assign, transfer, mortgage, pledge, or otherwise dispose of the shares of stock of any other corporation or corporations and may exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges of ownership thereof.

Now, that is just the way that section read when the bill was introduced. It was amended, but the powers given by that section were by the amendment limited rather than extended. The veto message of the governor says:

This section reverses the public policy of the State which has obtained since 1872, and in my judgment does not provide proper safeguards or define the proper limitations to the power of corporations to own stock in other corporations. It confers larger powers upon corporations in this direction than are granted to them by any other great commercial State in the United States, so far as I have been able to ascertain during the time which I have had for the consideration of the measure.

He did not go into all the merits of the case.

I have been furnished with a copy of the opinion of the attorney general of the State of Illinois which was given to the governor before that veto message was written, and it may be profitable at this time to read extracts from such opinion respecting that measure, the passage of which, had it not been vetoed, might have yielded to the jack-pot fund $35,000.

He calls attention to section 31 and to the powers under it to purchase and hold, and so forth, and says:

Section 31 of senate bill No. 286 not only empowers all corporations for profit, both domestic and foreign, to invest in, purchase, own, sell, and otherwise dispose of the shares in any other corporation or corporations engaged in the manufacture, use, or sale of property, or in the construction or operation of works, but it expressly enables the corporation so investing, in purchasing or owning such shares in other corporations, to exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges incident to such ownership. This means that the corporation so owning such shares in other corporations, whether for investment or for whatever purpose acquired, may vote such shares at stockholders' meetings of such other corporations, and thereby participate in the management of such other corporations; and if a majority of the shares of such other corporations is secured, whether for purposes of investment or other purposes, to elect its directors and dictate its policy, and by acquiring two-thirds of the shares of such other corporation or corporations, it could, under other provisions of this bill, change the name, place of business, number of directors, consolidate with other corporations, or dissolve it or them. With this power, it is not perceived how one corporation could be prevented from bringing any number of other competing corporations under its control and putting them out of business, whether such other corporations be engaged in business of a private nature or in business affected with a public interest.

There is the opinion of the attorney general as to the scope of the authority given under section 31 of that act on which this veto was based.

Further on, in this opinion of the attorney general, he says:

Section 5 of the general incorporation act now in force provides:

"Corporations formed under this act * * * may own, possess, and enjoy so much real and personal estate as shall be necessary for the transaction of their business, and may sell and dispose of the same when not required for the uses of the corporation. * * * Provided, however, That all real estate so acquired in satisfaction of any liability or indebtedness, unless the same may be necessary and suitable for the business of such corporation, shall be offered at public auction at least once every year at the door of the courthouse of the county wherein the same be situated, or on the premises so to be sold, after giving notice thereof for at least four consecutive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation published in said county."

* * * * * * *

"Provided further, That in case such corporation shall not, within such period of five years, sell such land either at public or private sale, as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the State's attorney to proceed by information, in the name of the people of the State of Illinois, against such corporation in the circuit court of the county within which such lands so neglected to be sold shall be situated; and such courts shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the fact and to order the sale of such land or real estate at such time and place, subject to such rules as the court shall establish."

Then he says, speaking of the measure which the governor vetoed:

This bill contains no provision whatever compelling corporations to sell or dispose of real estate which may be acquired by them beyond what is necessary and suitable for the business of such corporation at any time. Much real estate may be acquired by a corporation from time to time in a manner incidental to the transaction of its business—acquired in satisfaction of liabilities or indebtedness. They are authorized by this bill to lease, mortgage, or sell any or all of such real estate at pleasure, out of the State as well as within it, but are not required to offer it or sell or dispose of it at all, and section 5 of the general corporation act above quoted is expressly repealed.

I discover nothing in the bill requiring corporations to sell a foot of the lands acquired during the lives thereof.

There is no authority given by this bill to the attorney general, to State's attorneys, or to any other officer of the State to take any action to compel the sale or disposition of real estate acquired and owned by corporations in this State, domestic or foreign.

To permit corporations to hold real estate in this State in perpetuity is clearly contrary to the public policy of the State. Section 5 of the general incorporation act now in force is a statute against perpetuity. Our general assemblies have from the organization of the Government manifested a clear and decided opposition to permitting corporate bodies to hold lands in perpetuity. The prejudicial effect of holding large bodies of land in perpetuity led to the enactment of the laws of mortmain in Great Britain. The war against perpetuities has been carried on in this country and there has been no relaxation of this policy so well established in this State until the adoption of this bill.

What was the object of that bill, except to allow by law the great, rich trust corporations of Illinois to swallow up smaller corporations, and, by removing those provisions of the present law which compel corporations every five years to sell and dispose of the real estate not required in the management of their business, to enable these powerful "trusts" to acquire unlimited bodies of real estate and hold the same in perpetuity?

I have given the Senate the opinion of the attorney general of the State of Illinois upon that subject. I base all I have to say upon that opinion, never having personally examined the laws of that State.

That bill had been pending in the legislature which elected Mr. LORIMER to this body. White, without naming the bill, had described it so that Gov. Deneen thought he recognized it. The governor disliked to veto the bill, because it would have brought a revenue of a million dollars annually to the State of Illinois, and the officials had counted upon that to meet the expenses of the State. Nevertheless, even at a loss of a million dollars annually in State revenues, he saw fit to veto the measure, because it would have destroyed the policy of the State which had been in existence for nearly forty years, and, as he said in his testimony, would have given power to incorporate a concern for the ostensible purpose of running a barber shop and under that incorporation run a railroad.

I do not know whether or not there was anything connected with the provisions of that bill, or with Mr. Bancroft's part in preparing it, which Mr. Funk thought might attract attention and work to the detriment of his stockholders if they were to become known. He says his motive in hiding his identity as the author of this story was that he wanted to protect his company and his stockholders; that he did not want to create antagonisms or hostilities against his company. But whatever the motive which governed his action, the fact remains that secrecy regarding the authority for the statements it contained has been maintained in every quarter where divulging it could possibly result in an honest investigation of its truth or falsity. It has been used everywhere with the same stealth that an assassin would use a dagger, to bring death to WILLIAM LORIMER's political standing and station. On the other hand, it has never been used where, under the law of the State or Nation, it could be tested as to its weight or value until it came before this committee.

The real purpose of this Chicago combination in the secret use of the Funk story was to create public sentiment, which, acting upon the Senate of the United States, would deprive WILLIAM LORIMER of his seat in this body and would drive him out of politics in the State of Illinois. To this end Mr. Kohlsaat, who says that for 20 years he also has been the political enemy of Mr. LORIMER—although he speaks very kindly and in complimentary terms of his personal character—did that to which I am about to call attention. I say this with sorrow, because of the admiration I have entertained for Mr. Kohlsaat and because of the very agreeable personal relations I have enjoyed with him and the courtesies I have received at his hands. I do not say he was acting corruptly in this matter. He was acting under what I conceive to be a false code of honor, one which he himself describes as being necessary to be observed on the part of newspaper proprietors and conductors—that they must preserve with strictness the source of information that comes to them; otherwise they never would be able to secure news. If you wish to read his justification for this attitude, it can be found on the second or third page of the report of the committee, where his testimony before the Helm committee is given.

I call attention to this because I do not like to appear to be saying unkind things of Mr. Kohlsaat; and yet I must, standing here to-day, tell how this story has been used, no matter upon whom it may reflect.

Mr. Kohlsaat told this Funk story, as he says, in confidence, to James Keeley, manager of the Chicago Tribune, and James Keeley used it the following day in what is known as the "sawdust editorial."

Mr. Kohlsaat immediately communicated the story—also in confidence, always in confidence—to Victor F. Lawson, of the Chicago Daily News, going so far as to reveal to him the name of Mr. Funk as his informant, and Mr. Kohlsaat testified that the information so conveyed to Mr. Lawson thereafter influenced his editorial policy during the entire period of the Lorimer investigation and gave him confidence to be very specific in his editorials in regard to the belief that money was used to buy the election.

This story was always given "in confidence," but in what Mr. Kohlsaat calls "newspaper confidence"—that is to say, the source of the information must not be disclosed. With that limitation the alleged facts may be sown broadcast wherever any desired purpose may be served; they may be published and the most damaging deductions may be drawn if so phrased that an action for libel will not lie.

How could Senator LORIMER protect himself under these circumstances? How could he answer publications of this character or refute base insinuations made day after day without the slightest intimation as to their source?

IT COULD NOT BE SUSTAINED.

Why all this secrecy; all this effort to keep this story out of judicial channels? Funk gives as a reason that it could not be sustained; that it would be "his word against Edward Hines's." He was right in that. The time came when it was imperatively necessary that his story should be substantiated. No one realized it more keenly than he. It was 20 months after his interview with Hines. Mr. Kohlsaat, still protecting Funk and the Harvester company, had on the 15th of February an editorial published in the Record-Herald, in which he made this inquiry: Do we know all there is to be known concerning the $100,000 fund that was raised to pay for LORIMER's votes? To bolster up his own position Funk testifies that Mr. Hines came to him in a state of agitation and said that Funk had misunderstood what Hines had said to him in that interview away back 18 or 20 months before.

Mr. Funk's testimony on this point is:

Mr. FUNK. Mr. Hines arrived at my office one morning shortly after I got there, about 9 o'clock, and he was admitted to my room. He seemed to be considerably agitated, and he immediately began to talk with me about our former conversation.

Mr. MARBLE. What did he say?

Mr. FUNK. I can not repeat it verbatim; but in substance he undertook to refresh my memory as to what our previous conversation had been.

Mr. MARBLE. As nearly as you can, give what he said.

Senator KERN. It is important that we should have the substance of that conversation if you can not remember the exact words.

Mr. FUNK. The substance of it was that he did not want me to misunderstand our talk the other day; that he had not meant to say that any money was used, but that he was only discussing with me in a general way the situation down there; and that he got to thinking about it afterwards and thought that I might not have understood it, and he was back there to clear it up for me.

* * * * * * *

Senator LEA. Did you express dissent?

Mr. FUNK. My recollection is that I told him that I thought I remembered the thing as it was. I disposed of him as quickly as I could, because, as I remember it, we were having a directors' meeting that morning, or a conference of some kind, which was of considerable importance, and they were waiting for me. And I got rid of him and left the room as soon as I could. I do not think he was in the office over three minutes.

Senator LEA. Did you part on friendly terms that day?

Mr. FUNK. Casual terms.

Senator LEA. Was he satisfied with the visit, apparently, when he left?

Mr. FUNK. I did not observe in particular as to whether he was or not. My recollection is that he was not.

Senator LEA. He was not?

Mr. FUNK. That is just an impression. I did not controvert his version of the thing. I heard him, and got out as soon as I could without making any particular comment about it.

Senator LEA. Was his manner calm or excited or agitated?

Mr. FUNK. It was rather agitated.

Edward Hines says that statement is an absolute falsehood; and not only that, but that it was a physical impossibility for him to have been there at that time. The committee considered all of the testimony, and found, by unimpeachable evidence, that Edward Hines was in the city of Washington at the time fixed by Mr. Funk. Every witness introduced (and they were numerous) testified to the fact, and telegrams, telephone receipts, hotel bills and receipts, long-distance and telephone calls, all go to show that for a week prior to the day Funk sets for that interview (and he makes the day definite in connection with the publication of the editorial) and for a month afterwards, Edward Hines never breathed the air of Chicago. He was not there.

Clarence S. Funk's story is false in its inception, and is disproved by facts and circumstances which are firmly established. His attempt to substantiate his version of the meeting with Mr. Hines on May 27, 1909, by trying to bring Edward Hines into his presence to say that he had misunderstood what the latter had said on that occasion falls to the ground.

Passing that incident, we come to a further consideration of Mr. Funk as a witness. When asked before the committee how he knew whom Mr. Hines preferred for United States Senator, he replied:

You would see his name in the paper every few days in connection with activities at Springfield, or hear it as a matter of general talk in the streets.

Bear those words in mind—"in connection with activities at Springfield." What for? Helping in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

On cross-examination, when his mind was specifically directed to the subject, Mr. Funk testified, among other things, as follows:

Mr. HYNES. You spoke, Mr. Funk, of Mr. Hines's activities at Springfield. What did you have reference to there?

Mr. FUNK. Why, it was a matter of common talk that he was very active down there.

Mr. HYNES. What did you understand he was doing down there?

Mr. FUNK. Pulling wires for the election of Senator LORIMER.

Mr. HYNES. What do you mean by that? What was he doing? How long was he down there in Springfield before the election?

Mr. FUNK. I do not know.

Mr. HYNES. How long before the election did you hear that?

Mr. FUNK. I heard it frequently.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HYNES. Do you remember anybody who told you that he was down at Springfield active there in pulling wires for Senator LORIMER?

Mr. FUNK. I think that was a matter of common talk.

Mr. HYNES. Can you tell me anybody that said it?

Mr. FUNK. I met a great many people that talked about it. I can not recall any particular man that made that particular statement.

These statements must be considered in connection with the fact that Mr. Hines was not in Springfield during the entire session of the legislature. He had not been in Springfield for three years prior to that session, and he did not go there during the session. He did not go to Springfield until two years after the session, when he was summoned to appear before the Helm committee.

There is the second attempt of Clarence S. Funk to bolster up his testimony—his attempt to attack Mr. Hines for his activity. Hines was here in Washington all that time, and never even talked about the senatorial election in Illinois for more than two months after the legislature met and began voting for a United States Senator.

Mr. Hines's judgment that Funk came to him the year before, on purpose to "curry favor" with Mr. LORIMER, is sustained by a multitude of circumstances. At Funk's request Hines went to see Mr. LORIMER to talk the matter over with him. Funk was trying to get in touch with Hines the following week when the latter was in Washington. Mr. Hines introduced Mr. Funk to Mr. LORIMER at Mr. Funk's request, later in the season, when both were in Washington. Mr. Hines's version of the entire matter has been confirmed by the testimony of witnesses or by the production of records. Mr. Funk sinks under the weight of the evidence brought against him; all of his contentions have failed of substantiation.

WHY NOT USED IN LEGAL CHANNELS.

Why was not this Funk story used in legal channels, where it might and should have been presented if true? The grand jury was in session in Chicago from May 2 until May 20. Nothing regarding the origin of a fund from which White could have received bribery money, except the story of the "jack pot," was ever brought to the attention of that grand jury. Think of that for a moment. Think of the importance of it!

White's story was that he had received $1,000 for voting for LORIMER, and in addition he confessed that he had received $900 from a "jack pot," the purpose of which has been described. There was notice of the "jack pot" which could not be ignored by candid men. Moreover, each of the three witnesses told the grand jury that they received $900 each from that same source, and it was not LORIMER money. It can not be denied that "jack-pot" money was shown to exist, yet no attempt was made to trace it. There was no testimony but White's, and that unsustained, of any payment in LORIMER's behalf.

But within the breast of Mr. McCormick, Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Kohlsaat, Mr. Keeley, and Mr. Lawson was knowledge of the story told by Clarence S. Funk, that Mr. Hines had told him of a fund of $100,000 raised for the specific purpose of electing Mr. LORIMER, and they never permitted it to be called to the attention of the grand jury, then in session, although all these gentlemen were vigorously pushing the fight to unseat Mr. LORIMER.

ITS USE IN CREATION OF PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

I wish Senators would look at the issue of the Chicago Sunday Tribune for May 29. See that advertisement, going across the entire seven columns of the paper:

The Chicago Tribune offers $5,000 reward for legal proof of the identity of all the members of the "syndicate" which put up the money for LORIMER'S election to the United States Senate.

That states as a fact that money was put up for the election of LORIMER; that there was a "syndicate" which put up the money for that purpose; and offers this reward for evidence that would bring about the conviction of all its members. They were mighty safe in making that offer, were they not?

"Five thousand dollars reward for legal proof of the identity of all the members of the 'syndicate'!"

And that appears right over the professed "confession" of Holstlaw, procured as I have described, with a large picture of Holstlaw, saying of him:

One more says he was bribed for LORIMER.

That is the way public sentiment was created by these gentlemen. And yet these same men had not the courage nor the fairness to carry that story before the grand jury and have it investigated. Why did not Mr. Wayman, the State's attorney for that county, do it? He had notice served upon him every morning at his breakfast table, through the Chicago Tribune, that such a fund had been raised and that its purpose was to "put LORIMER over." The Helm committee, a year afterwards, upon simply an editorial in the Record-Herald saying, "Do we know all there is to be known concerning the $100,000 fund that was raised to pay for LORIMER'S votes," summoned Mr. Kohlsaat before it and ordered him to testify; and when he refused he was confronted with the alternative of disclosing his informant or going to jail. It was only when Kohlsaat was going to jail because of his failure to comply with the mandate of that committee that Mr. Funk reluctantly came forward and confessed that he was the man, and told his story to that body.

When he was going to such lengths to get at the bottom of this matter, why did not Mr. Wayman call Mr. Keeley before that grand jury, and bring out through him, at the very commencement, precisely the information disclosed to the Helm committee a year later? He had more data before him daily through the Chicago Tribune than did the Helm committee through the Record-Herald, and it all emanated from the same fountain head—Clarence S. Funk.

No fact ever appeared more clearly in any case than the fact revealed in this investigation that there was a fixed determination on the part of those intrusted with a knowledge of the Funk story to keep it out of all legal channels where its authenticity could be tested, but to use it to poison the public mind, as it has been used, not simply to drive Mr. LORIMER from the Senate, but to drive Senators from this Chamber who have had the courage to stand here and vote according to their convictions, that upon the evidence adduced Mr. LORIMER'S election was legal and that he was entitled to his seat in this body. It has been used in an attempt to make cowards of every Member of this body.

Those advertisements were right under the eyes of Mr. Wayman day after day. I go a little further and come to June 2, when they change the form of the advertisement. Now it reads:

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS REWARD.

Not over half a dozen men, representing various lines of business, "put up" the money that purchased the votes to elect WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate.

Now, there is a statement of alleged facts that has gone all over the United States.

These men, so the Tribune is told, were the "underwriting syndicate." After LORIMER was elected, members of the "syndicate" called on other business interests and said substantially as follows:

"We" (naming the various members of the syndicate) "put up the money to elect LORIMER. It had to be done in a hurry and we advanced the cash. We felt that you would be willing to contribute your share, and we think $10,000 (or $5,000) would be the proper amount for you to subscribe."

The Tribune will pay $5,000 for legal proof of the identity of "the syndicate."

There is the Funk story in its entirety. That advertisement contains a direct statement, an allegation as of fact, of every element of Mr. Funk's version of his interview with Mr. Hines. That was published in every issue of the Tribune from June 2 to June 7, the very day that the jury was summoned to try Lee O'Neil Browne on the charge of bribery.

What was the influence of such an advertisement as that upon the thinking people of Chicago, alleging bald facts, educating everyone to such a belief? And yet every one of these men carefully kept any information they had as to the authority upon which that story was predicated from the grand jury of Cook County. Mr. President, I want every Senator in this body to face that proposition when he considers the story of Mr. Funk and attempts to base his action upon it. In all my experience in the trial of causes I never have been connected with a case wherein I found a determination more perfectly conceived and more carefully carried out than the determination of Mr. Kohlsaat, Editor Keeley, and Clarence S. Funk to use that story secretly wherever it would injure Mr. LORIMER and wherever it would injure anyone connected with Mr. LORIMER as his friend or his supporter. Nor have I ever had knowledge of a more determined purpose than theirs to keep this story away from any legal or investigating body that might test it and ascertain its truth or falsity.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont. Was this Funk statement made to the Tribune before the first report in this case?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRADLEY. Was it called to the attention of the committee?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Never in the world. It was carefully kept from the committee. Of course it never came to the committee.

The investigation by the Cook County grand jury began in May. The first trial of Lee O'Neil Browne followed in June; the second trial of Browne in August and September; the Burrows committee sat in September and October, and during that whole time Funk's story was in the possession of the gentlemen I have mentioned, was used by them wherever and whenever it would create public sentiment, but it never was brought before any tribunal of any kind anywhere. Not until a month after the Senate had decided that Mr. LORIMER was entitled to his seat was it disclosed except as indicated, and then to the Helm investigating committee.

I said these advertisements based upon the Funk story were continued in the Tribune up to June 7, when Mr. Browne was placed on trial. I have called attention to the Tribune's attitude and the manner in which these advertisements were displayed and why they attracted attention. I do not charge that they were published with a purpose to control the result of the trial which was coming on. Senators must judge for themselves what the purpose of the Tribune was in keeping such statements of alleged fact before the public eye of Chicago immediately preceding the trial of Browne, which trial was to determine the question whether Browne had in fact bribed White to vote for Mr. LORIMER.

But Funk's story was not permitted to be tested in that trial. Even though it is the only statement that has ever been made in any way suggesting that there was a fund raised for the purpose of electing Senator LORIMER, and even though it was in the possession of the avowed enemies of Mr. LORIMER, they would not allow it to be investigated either before the grand jury that indicted Browne nor in the court wherein he was tried. That is a most significant fact.

COL. ROOSEVELT'S USE OF THE STORY.

Let us go a little further. That trial resulted in a disagreement of the jury. August 4 a second trial of Lee O'Neil Browne was begun, and while that trial was in progress, about the middle of August, Col. Roosevelt visited Chicago on his way to the West. I believe he was on his way to Cheyenne.

During his short visit to Chicago, Mr. Kohlsaat says he took him for an automobile ride through the parks and had him to himself for an hour and a half, during which time he told him Funk's story, in confidence, of course, but gave him Funk's name as his informant as well as Hines's name as the man who made the statement, and Col. Roosevelt proceeded on his way to Cheyenne.

In the month of August the second trial of Lee O'Neil Browne came on and continued until September 9. Col. Roosevelt returned to Chicago on the 8th day of September, where, on the evening of that day he was to be the guest of honor at a banquet given by the Hamilton Club, of which club Senator LORIMER was a member. Col. Roosevelt was met in a neighboring city on the morning of that day by a committee of the club, including its president, to whom he announced that he would not attend the banquet if Senator LORIMER was permitted to be present, and he was so insistent in this demand that the president of the club was compelled to telegraph Senator LORIMER informing him of the situation and withdrawing his invitation for that evening.

It so happened that on this very day the presiding judge in the case against Lee O'Neil Browne was delivering his final instructions to the jury.

All the Chicago newspapers exploited the incident in a most sensational manner, devoting column after column and page after page to that purpose. The wires were crowded with messages to the principal newspapers throughout the United States, giving startling accounts of the incident, and spreading broadcast among all the people this public denunciation of Senator LORIMER by this exalted personage. It may be said in all truth that Col. Roosevelt's refusal to sit at meat with Senator LORIMER on that occasion has done more to excite a strong public sentiment against Senator LORIMER throughout the United States and to create a belief that there was some real fundamental ground for such action than any other one circumstance that could have been used or has been used to accomplish that purpose. One need only examine the newspapers published at that time and note the number of columns devoted to that occurrence, the number of public and influential men who were interviewed concerning it, and what was published editorially in connection with it to understand the profound sensation it produced, not only in Chicago where it occurred but everywhere through the country.

In view of the tremendous influence it has had, we may well inquire the reason for this action. Why could not Col. Roosevelt sit at meat with Senator LORIMER?

The answer is found in a letter addressed by Mr. Kohlsaat to Senator ROOT of this body, also "in confidence," in which he says:

When Col. Roosevelt was here on his way to Cheyenne I told him of the incident, and it was the prime motive that prompted him to decline to sit at the Hamilton Club banquet with LORIMER.

Mr. Kohlsaat's testimony before this committee shows that it was not due to any personal knowledge upon the part of Col. Roosevelt, nor to any preconceived notions he had of Senator LORIMER'S character or of the circumstances of his election, but that it was the Funk story told by Kohlsaat to him on that drive through the parks a month earlier that induced this unwarranted attack upon Senator LORIMER. Referring to Col. Roosevelt, Mr. Kohlsaat testified: "He wrote me a letter subsequently that that was the reason he declined to attend the dinner," and in order to maintain his reputation and preach the cause of righteousness Col. Roosevelt went to that banquet that night, and in his speech made a violent assault upon Senator LORIMER which was published the length and the breadth of the land.

Do not forget that it is the testimony of Mr. Kohlsaat, that the Funk story told by him "in confidence" to Col. Roosevelt, was the basis of and "prime reason" for this unwarranted attack upon Mr. LORIMER. It was used secretly but with deadly effect. Yet in that trial of Lee O'Neil Browne, then drawing to a close, no effort had been made by any of these men who were engaged in strengthening this attack on the validity of Mr. LORIMER'S election to have this story, that had so bitterly poisoned Col. Roosevelt's mind, and so madly incensed him against Mr. LORIMER, tested before the jury in that case. And do not forget that the story had never been permitted to come to the ears of Mr. LORIMER, and he was suffering these attacks in entire ignorance of their cause.

I have had brought in the Chicago Record-Herald and the Tribune and the other Chicago papers giving an account of Col. Roosevelt's return, the indignation he felt, and the address he made, and the interviews of prominent citizens on the subject of his action. Any Senator who is interested and wants to look them over has the privilege of doing so.

STORY WITHHELD FROM FORMER SENATE COMMITTEE.

Remember, now, that that was the 8th day of September. In the meantime this Senate in response to a resolution that was offered by Senator LORIMER himself, had directed the Committee on Privileges and Elections to investigate the regularity and validity of Mr. LORIMER's election. Senator Burrows, then chairman of the committee, appointed a subcommittee to make the investigation, and went to Chicago for that purpose. The committee began its work September 20 and remained in session for three full weeks. The Chicago Tribune appeared and asked to be represented by counsel. It wanted to prosecute the charges of corruption in connection with the election of Senator LORIMER. The committee knew no better means of securing all the facts than to allow those who made the charges to conduct the prosecution. It consented to this arrangement. Mr. Austrian, one of the brightest lawyers in Chicago, appeared for the Chicago Tribune. The Tribune actually conducted the prosecution before the committee. Its attorney, Mr. Austrian, furnished the list of witnesses, and, although in full possession of the Funk story, Manager Keeley, according to his own testimony, having told it to him previously, he failed to name Edward Hines as a witness; he failed to name Mr. Kohlsaat as a witness; he failed to name Mr. Keeley as a witness. Although the hearings of that committee were held just across the street from the Harvester Co.'s office, neither Mr. Funk nor Mr. McCormick nor the attorney for that corporation, Mr. Bancroft, presented themselves with the information now claimed to have been in their possession. Neither the Tribune, the Record-Herald, nor the Daily News, although within five minutes' walk of the committee's meeting place, gave any intimation concerning the Funk story. Its existence was never even hinted at by anyone in the presence of that committee, where it might and should have been investigated, thus saving the enormous cost in time and money of this investigation.

That committee returned here and made its report to the Senate without ever having heard a suggestion of such a story, and the Senate was permitted to go on for two months, to debate this matter and to take action upon it, without any knowledge whatever of this story. Not a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections had heard a breath of it, and only two Members of the Senate had been informed of it, and they under an obligation of secrecy, which they observed.

REFUSAL TO DISCLOSE IT TO THE SENATE.

If you will turn to page 4 of the committee's report, you will find that January 17, 1911, the very day that the Helm committee was created, Mr. H. H. Kohlsaat wrote a letter to Senator ELIHU ROOT at Washington, in which he says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have just received a call from some well-known people here, among them Mr. Walter L. Fisher, asking me if I would not write you and tell you of an incident in the LORIMER senatorial election. My friends thought that if you had this personal knowledge it would be of assistance to you in strengthening your belief that money was used to elect LORIMER. The information was given to me in confidence, and, as a newspaper man, I feel the same obligation to maintain secrecy that a priest does of a confession.

The information conveyed in that letter had been used to poison the public mind everywhere, as I have described. It had been used secretly, whenever and as often as opportunity offered to destroy Mr. LORIMER's reputation and deprive him of his seat in the Senate, as secretly as an assassin would use a dagger or a murderer would use poison. Now, at the last moment, when this body was sitting here as judges in a judicial proceeding, he writes a confidential letter to a leader of this body, to one of the judges, but under a pledge of secrecy, a secrecy as strong as that which would be observed by a priest when he receives a penitent's confession.

The letter continues:

Some time last June I met a friend who is general manager of a Chicago corporation with a capital of over $25,000,000. He said, "I have been intending to call on you for some days to tell you of an incident that occurred right after LORIMER's election a year ago. I had a visit from Edward Hines, the lumberman, and he told me that LORIMER's friends had had the opportunity of electing him to the Senate by putting up $100,000; that they had only a few days before the adjournment of the legislature, and could not take the time to go around and raise the money, so a half dozen of LORIMER's friends underwrote the $100,000 and gave it to the proper agent. LORIMER was elected, and we are now asking some of the corporations to pay in their share. I am taking care of the down-town district, and another man (mentioning his name) has charge of the stockyards. We figure that your share will be $10,000." My friend answered substantially as follows: "I can not give you any money for two reasons: First, we are not in that kind of business; and second, if you have gotten yourselves into a hole why should you expect us to pull you out?"

On the strength of this statement the Record-Herald has explicitly stated several times, editorially, that $100,000 was raised to buy LORIMER's election, and we have never had a protest from anybody on it. The man who gave me this information is absolutely reliable. He had no object in telling me a falsehood, and I believe him thoroughly.

When Col. Roosevelt was here on his way to Cheyenne I told him of the incident, and it was the prime motive that prompted him to decline to sit at the Hamilton Club banquet with LORIMER.

Hoping that this may be of some value to you, believe me,

Yours, sincerely,

H. H. KOHLSAAT.

Referring to Funk's story, Mr. Kohlsaat says:

On the strength of this statement the Record-Herald has explicitly stated several times, editorially, that $100,000 was raised to buy LORIMER's election, and we have never had a protest from anybody on it.

Consider the plausibility of that statement. "We have never had a protest from anybody on it." Why should they have a protest, and from whom? Who could answer to that sort of suggestion?

The story had never been told except where it could injure WILLIAM LORIMER, and then under a pledge of secrecy or completely veiled. Mr. Kohlsaat had told it at a club to Walter L. Fisher, now Secretary of the Interior. He had told it to Manager Keeley. He told it to Victor F. Lawson, his friend, who made it the basis of his editorial policy throughout the entire time. It was known within a small circle of friends, all opposed to Mr. LORIMER, and it was used whenever an opportunity offered to aid in bringing about the downfall of WILLIAM LORIMER; it was used with that object in view and used with an art and with an ability which I have never seen equaled.

Senator ROOT did not make this letter public in the Senate. He replied to it February 11, strongly urging Mr. Kohlsaat to induce his friend who had given him the information upon which his letter was based to disclose his identity. Upon the receipt of Senator ROOT's letter Mr. Kohlsaat sent for Mr. Clarence S. Funk, general manager of the International Harvester Co., the friend to whom he referred in his letter to Senator ROOT as his informant, but whose name he had not revealed, showed him the letter, and told him he was the only man who could settle that question. Mr. Funk, after full consideration, refused to allow his name to be given, and of this Mr. Kohlsaat informed Senator ROOT in the following letter, dated February 15, Chicago, Ill.:

DEAR SENATOR ROOT: Your favor of the 11th at hand. I agree with you my friend's testimony would greatly help at this time, but it would absolutely ruin him to take the stand. He was approached as an officer of the company, not as an individual, and could not come out in the open without the consent of the directors, some of whom are friendly to LORIMER—

I do not know whom—

You can imagine the situation he is, and would be, in.

I know some of the forces at work to keep LORIMER in the Senate. If they succeed, God help us; a day of reckoning will surely come to the American people.

The weakness of the anti-Lorimerites is that the Chicago Tribune is back of the fight to unseat LORIMER. That paper is rendering a great service to the people of these United States.

Your speech made a great impression throughout the West. It was a wonderful plea for the right.

Yours, faithfully,

H. H. KOHLSAAT.

To Senator ELIHU ROOT,
Washington, D. C.

On that same day, February 15, 1911, Mr. Kohlsaat published in the Record-Herald an editorial in which the following language was used:

Do we know all there is to be known concerning the $100,000 fund that was raised to pay for LORIMER's votes?

Note the dates. Think of it. February 15, 1911, Kohlsaat writes to Senator ROOT that Mr. Funk will not permit his name to be used, and yet he himself that very day used in the Record-Herald the same old poison, spreading it broadcast throughout the United States, poisoning honest minds and creating sentiment against Senator LORIMER which he was powerless to meet.

That editorial attracted wide attention everywhere. It caused inquiries to be made of Mr. Kohlsaat by Senator LA FOLLETTE and others who wanted to know the truth, who were anxious to ascertain upon what authority such a statement and inquiry was made, and what the facts were with respect to the raising of the alleged fund. Senator LA FOLLETTE telegraphed Mr. Kohlsaat asking for information regarding the allegation of the existence of a fund of $100,000 and received in reply the following telegram:

CHICAGO, February 21, 1911.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, Washington, D. C.:

If I had all the details of the raising and disposition of the $100,000, would not have asked the editorial question. * * *

Think of it—putting that out in the form of a declaration which everybody would believe, and then telegraphing Senator LA FOLLETTE that if he had the facts he should not have asked the question.

That $100,000 was raised for that purpose I have absolutely no shadow of doubt, BUT CAN NOT PROVE—

Mark the words—

BUT CAN NOT PROVE. We have made the assertion a number of times editorially. The assertion has never been challenged. You are the first person to ask for particulars.

H. H. KOHLSAAT.

Why did they not put that story where it could be proved? All they had to do was to summon Clarence S. Funk and Edward Hines, just as they were summoned before this committee; but they did not do it. Why did they not do it? They were engaged in a grand project to secure the expulsion from this body of WILLIAM LORIMER. They were educating the public mind, and that work was going on not only in the Central West, but it extended to the Pacific and to the Atlantic coasts.

Senator LA FOLLETTE was very anxious to secure information. He was so anxious that he tried to induce Mr. Kohlsaat to come to Washington, and failing to do that, he wired his friend, Charles R. Crane, to see Mr. Kohlsaat and try to induce him to come. Mr. Crane visited Mr. Kohlsaat, exhibited the telegram, and urged him to come. Mr. Kohlsaat repeated to Mr. Crane the story he had written to Senator ROOT, but refused either to visit Washington or to reveal the name of his informant. Immediately thereafter, February 22, 1911, Mr. Kohlsaat sent the following telegram to Senator LA FOLLETTE. I will read only the body of it:

Please ask Senator ROOT to show you my letters of January 17 and February 15. I gave Charles Crane this morning my reasons for not giving names. He agreed with me that it would not be just right or wise to do so.

And that is the newspaper conscience to which he testified before the Helm committee.

Throughout the long debates in the Senate neither of those Senators made public this story.

Action was taken on the 1st of March, 1911, by which Mr. LORIMER was declared to be entitled to his seat. A month later the Helm committee did that which Mr. Wayman should have done a year before. Mr. Kohlsaat was summoned before that committee and the disclosure of the authorship of that story was forced, Mr. Funk being compelled to testify in order to save his friend from jail, and upon his testimony, incorporated in the report of the Helm committee to this body, this Senate took action and the case was reopened.

RESULTS OF INVESTIGATION.

The case was reopened on the ground of newly discovered evidence. That evidence was the Funk story and to whatever it might lead. This committee has given all of the evidence adduced most careful consideration. It has found, in the first place, that Mr. Funk's story of his interview with Mr. Hines is without foundation.

Not only that, all the circumstances of Mr. Hines's life during the entire period of the Senatorial deadlock in the Illinois Legislature were examined, and the committee finds, and states, explicitly, that he had nothing to do with raising a fund of $100,000 or any other fund to be used in connection with the election of WILLIAM LORIMER, and that there is not a particle of evidence, direct or indirect, that such a fund was contemplated by anyone, or that such a fund was needed to aid in his election. There are absolutely no newly discovered facts in this case that are adverse to Senator LORIMER'S right to his seat in this body. The so-called newly discovered evidence only serves to strengthen and make clear his right to his seat.

We have opened up a new field of evidence in this case, which I discussed at an early period in these extended remarks. I refer to the political situation existing in the Illinois Legislature at the time Mr. LORIMER was elected. That is all new to the Senate, and it sheds a flood of light upon the occurrences in that body. It shows beyond doubt, when candidly studied, that he was elected by the force of natural conditions existing in the Legislature of Illinois at that time. The old case upon which Mr. LORIMER was adjudged entitled to a place in the Senate has been vastly strengthened by a study of the situation at the time of the deadlock. And in view of this fact and of the further fact that the fund of $100,000 mentioned in Funk's story is a fiction of his mind, and was never dreamed of by another person, the time has come when the Senate of the United States should apply the principle of res adjudicata and refuse further to consider the resolution. I have spoken at great length, and have, I fear, wearied the patience of the Senate, and I shall not further discuss that question. It was ably discussed this morning by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and will be taken up by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] before the debate closes.

Mr. President, the only apology I have to make for the great length of time which I have occupied in addressing the Senate upon this subject is that I have given a year of work to this investigation. The committee was almost constantly in session for a period of five months; and to take the vast volume of testimony gathered, sift it, digest it, reconcile discrepancies, to determine what parts of it are true and what false, and what portions of it are pertinent to the question to be decided, has been a most laborious and time-consuming undertaking, and to me it will be the happiest moment of the session when discussion ends and the questions involved are determined by the Senate.

As chairman of the committee I have felt compelled to aid any seeker after essential facts brought out in the investigation by placing in the record something like a consecutive statement of the circumstances of Mr. LORIMER'S election and of the history of subsequent developments and to bring into the light some of the salient features of the case which may help seekers after truth in this inquiry.

I would not have discussed some phases of this case as earnestly as I have were it not for the fact that I have personally felt the force of the public opinion that has been created by the combined influence of the Chicago press and the effect it has had upon the determination of this question. The criticism which I make, and I think it has good foundation, is, that no opportunity was ever given to either Senator LORIMER or Edward Hines to meet and refute the Funk story, which was in the possession of Editors Keeley, Kohlsaat, and Lawson from the beginning, and which was used by them secretly, but with terrible effect, to arouse public sentiment against Senator LORIMER'S right to retain his seat in this body. It was only when the Helm committee compelled it that Funk was revealed as the author of the story. During all the time it had been doing him such deadly injury Senator LORIMER was not afforded an opportunity to meet the secret accusations. This story, used in the manner I have described this afternoon, has led God-fearing, conscientious, honest people throughout the length and breadth of the United States to believe that a corruption fund of $100,000 was raised to elect WILLIAM LORIMER to the United States Senate, and yet the evidence not only fails to support such a contention, but absolutely disproves it. As a result of such underhanded efforts, good people can not understand how men whom they have elected to serve in this body, men who at home stand for that which is right, for that which is manly, for that which is honorable—men who have lived lives which have led people to trust them—they can not understand, I say, how such men can sit here and vote in favor of permitting Senator LORIMER to retain his seat in the Senate.

This feeling has been entertained by some of my stanchest friends in Vermont, and after my vote on the first day of March, 1911, against the resolution declaring that Senator LORIMER was not entitled to his seat, hardly a newspaper in Vermont, however friendly their attitude toward me, personally, could commend my action—they could not understand it—and while they treated me with the greatest possible consideration and with a confidence in my integrity which I never shall forget, I was conscious that they were disappointed. Because of this, and because of my unbounded respect for the opinion of my constituents I have wanted to place in the RECORD, that they may judge of my motives, some of the reasons for the position which I have felt compelled to assume in this case.

If standing for what I believe is right and true and just, for that which in my judgment is established by the evidence, must subject me to criticism, it will cause me the deepest regret, but bound by the solemn obligation of the oath I have taken I can but act upon my judgment and render my decision in accordance with the evidence before me. Sitting as a judge, I am obligated to determine my action, as I have done, upon the merits of the case in the light of all the facts disclosed and upon the evidence as a whole. It is of more importance to me to preserve a good conscience and be at peace with myself than to occupy a seat in this distinguished body.

Because of the position in which I have been placed, and because of my desire to aid the Senate by bringing to its attention the facts in the case as I view them, I must apologize for the time I have occupied, and in closing I wish to express my grateful appreciation of the patience which has been exercised by those of my associates who have done me the honor to listen to my remarks.

Mr. President, without having any knowledge which I can state with authority, I was informed that the other side of this question would proceed with this discussion. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] desire to be heard, and I had supposed they would follow the addresses made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and myself. I do not see either of them present this afternoon, and I do not know whether there is any Senator here who is ready to proceed with the discussion.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crane	Kenyon	Reed
Borah	Cullom	Lea	Sanders
Bourne	Curtis	Lorimer	Simmons
Bradley	Dillingham	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Dixon	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	du Pont	Myers	Smith, Md.
Brown	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Gallinger	Overman	Smoot
Burton	Gamble	Page	Stephenson
Catron	Gronna	Penrose	Thornton
Clapp	Heyburn	Perkins	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Williams
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Rayner	Works

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is before the Senate. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. On that question I ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, my understanding of the debate has been that all the members of the committee are going to discuss this question, and I have felt that I should not enter into a discussion of the subject until the members of the committee had finished expressing their views on this investigation. I understand that there are other Senators who intend to devote some time to the question, and I should prefer very much that they would go on. Because I have held that opinion and have been led to that opinion by what I have heard stated in private conversation among Senators, I have not at hand the notes I wish to use in discussing this subject, and I think on a question of such importance common fairness would suggest to the Senate that time should be given under those circumstances for gathering the minutes that I have prepared before we proceed to a vote on the matter.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess for 30 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate take a recess for 30 minutes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been trying to get the attention of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah withdraw his motion for the present?

Mr. SMOOT. I withdraw the motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I move that we take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I withdrew my motion for the purpose of a statement to be made by the Senator and not for a motion to be made.

Mr. REED. I do not want to take advantage of the Senator. I was going to move that as an amendment when I tried to attract the attention of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair observed the Senator standing, but the Senator did not address the Chair.

Mr. REED. I did, but the Chair did not hear me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the Senator.

Mr. REED. I would not take advantage of the courtesy of the Senator who made the motion in that form, but if the Senator's motion is before the Senate I will move to amend by making the hour to which the recess shall be taken to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to amend the motion of the Senator from Utah by providing that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the Senate take a recess for 30 minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess for 30 minutes.

At the expiration of the recess (at 3 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 23. An act to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW.; and

S. 5271. An act to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the police court of the District of Columbia in certain cases.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2904) to confer upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to regulate the operation and equipment of the vehicles of the Metropolitan Coach Co. with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 6083. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Benning Road, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1908;

H. R. 21710. An act to amend section 842 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia;

H. R. 21712. An act to amend section 808 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia;

H. R. 22010. An act to amend the license law, approved July 1, 1902, with respect to licenses of drivers of passenger vehicles for hire; and

H. R. 22648. An act to authorize a change in the location of Fourteenth Street NE., in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. Evidently no Senator desires to speak this afternoon, and it would be manifestly unfair to compel the Senator from Illinois to proceed. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend by making it 10 o'clock. This case has been pending many, many weeks, and any Senator who desires to speak has had ample opportunity to prepare himself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and the Senator from Kansas moves to amend by making it 10 o'clock. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. BACON. I make the point of order that, under the rule, the longest time is always put first, regardless of the order in which it is proposed. That is the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Georgia point the Chair to that rule?

Mr. BACON. I can do it without the slightest difficulty. It is a general rule of parliamentary law. The longest time is always put first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair assumes that the Senate is acting under the rule of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. There is no rule of the Senate to that effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces the motion to amend as being carried, and the question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah as amended.

The motion as amended was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m., Tuesday, July 9) the Senate took a recess until Wednesday, July 10, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 9, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. A. H. Thompson, of the Waugh Methodist Episcopal Church, as follows:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, in humble recognition of our dependence upon Thee, we come to Thee this day for help and guidance. Upon these Representatives of this greatest Nation upon the earth rest grave and solemn responsibilities; the issues of the ages perhaps depend upon their decisions here. We pray Thy blessing upon them. Be consciously near to them, guide their deliberations and so direct the decisions of this great body and of the American people that government by the people, of the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth. Graciously regard the Speaker of this House and each of its Members; bless them in their personal lives. Guard and shield and protect their loved ones, and so guide us all that finally we may be gathered into the home above through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to an error in the proceedings of yesterday. In the RECORD, on page 8716, on the last roll call, on the ordering of the previous question, the Speaker announced that a quorum was present. Evidently the Clerk in making the calculation, as will be seen from that page, reported to the Speaker that 160 had voted in the affirmative, and so forth, whereas a count of the names as recorded shows that 152 only voted in the affirmative and that there was not a quorum present. Of course, Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, on the 26th of July, 1886, Mr. Oates, of Alabama, rising to a question similar and yet the reverse of this, called attention to an error like this, but in that case a quorum had voted, but it had not been properly entered in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That was this case turned around.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; this case reversed. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the previous question on this rule be considered now as adopted, and that the House proceed with the three hours' debate as contemplated by the resolution, and that my request that the time be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker having had his figures given to him erroneously yesterday, and the Speaker having made an erroneous announcement that a quorum was present, when the Journal and the RECORD discloses that a quorum was not present, is it not necessary that all proceedings after that be vacated as void? The House could not act without a quorum when it was disclosed that a quorum was not present until the RECORD showed that a quorum was present.

While the Speaker announced that a quorum was present, that was not the fault of the Speaker, and I do not say it was anybody's fault; it was one of those accidental occurrences which sometimes happen. A quorum was not present.

The SPEAKER. What is the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. I think that all proceedings should be vacated and the question recur on the adoption of the previous question.

Mr. CLAYTON. Why not agree to the unanimous consent that I have asked?

Mr. MANN. That is another proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to say that before that is done I want to get myself straight on the RECORD. I am erroneously recorded as having voted "aye" when I voted "present." I would like to correct that before this is vacated.

The SPEAKER. There are several gentlemen who want to correct the RECORD and the Journal in this particular, and that will be attended to after this is disposed of.

Mr. CLAYTON. I asked unanimous consent in regard to this matter—I do not suppose it is necessary to restate my request.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that the first thing to determine is what is before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt about the method of procedure; he may be entirely wrong about it, but in his own mind he thinks that the vote on the previous question and all subsequent proceedings must be vacated.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the vote as indicated by the Speaker and all subsequent proceedings be vacated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks that the vote and the announcement made by the Speaker and all subsequent proceedings under that head be vacated. Is there objection?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If that request is granted and the previous question is again ordered, then will there be allowed 40 minutes' debate—20 minutes on each side?

The SPEAKER. That question will be decided when it comes up.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be a bad precedent if anybody objected. It seems to me that it is as if it never had been.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague [Mr. CANNON] will permit, I have examined the precedents and found one that is clearly in point. I am not sure, but I think my colleague was the Speaker of the House at the time. The Speaker, in that case, stated that the proceedings subsequent to the vote were undoubtedly void and that, without objection, those proceedings would be vacated. There being no objection, they were vacated. Of course that did not decide whether objection would prevent their being vacated, but as the precedent is already made I see no objection to following it.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary for the Chair to express an opinion about that, although he has a very clear opinion upon it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain a motion to vacate the proceedings.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the vote on the last roll call yesterday and the proceedings subsequent thereto be now vacated.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. If that were done, then could there be a correction of the RECORD as it now stands? I desire to correct the RECORD upon my vote. After the proceedings have been vacated, could that correction be made?

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] if any gentleman desires to correct the RECORD as far as that roll call is concerned the Chair will hear him.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, this is evidently going to be a precedent, and it occurred to me, as I think it occurs to others, that the Speaker has himself the power, after his attention has been called to the fact that there was no quorum, to declare all proceedings after the fact that no quorum has been ascertained to be null and void. While the Speaker may not at this time desire to pass upon the question, it seems to me that it ought not to go as a precedent now that a motion is necessary in order to vacate those proceedings.

The SPEAKER. If there is any authority on the subject, the Chair would be glad to hear it. This is the position of the Chair in respect to it. This House can not get into such a tangle that it can not straighten itself out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will pardon me, the first rule of this House and of the Constitution is that the House can not transact business unless a quorum is present. An error was made in announcing that a quorum was present, because of the fact that the tally clerk wrongly added the score. A quorum was not present. Therefore that roll call was void. The roll call itself disclosed that a quorum was not present, and therefore all subsequent proceedings in the day's work would be void until a quorum was found to be present. That must be clear, because the House can not do business unless a quorum is present. It seems to me, therefore, that when the question is raised, and unanimous consent can not be had to correct the error, it is in order for the Chair to declare that a quorum was not present during those proceedings, and therefore they are void, and thus, by the order and direction of the Chair, bring the House back to the point where this roll call was originally entered.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has also been suggested that the mere ascertainment of the fact that a quorum was not present is all that is necessary for the Chair to have in order to vacate the proceedings under the Constitution and the rules of the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does the gentleman think that that position will hold when a question is raised after the Journal has been approved by the Speaker and made of record?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the Journal has not been approved.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the Chair has already ascertained as a matter of fact that there was not a quorum present, and when the Chair has ascertained that fact without having it challenged, then there is nothing to be done except to vacate all proceedings, because there was no constitutional quorum in the House. It is not necessary, therefore, that a motion be made to do a thing which the Constitution demands shall be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated awhile ago that he had a precedent on the subject.

Mr. MANN. I have not the precedent before me, Mr. Speaker. I have no doubt that the Speaker has the authority to declare the proceedings vacated. On the other hand, I have no doubt that the House has the authority to do the same thing by motion. That is the proposition now pending. The Journal has been read. This is a matter of correcting the Journal. The Journal has, theoretically, been approved by the Speaker before being read, and whatever action is taken should be in connection with the approval of the Journal. If the proceedings are vacated by a motion, I assume that carries with it that the Journal shall be corrected accordingly, because the matter now comes up upon the approval of the Journal.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will suspend, the Chair will read it.

On December 19, 1903, page 80, Congressional Journal:
The Speaker announced that by error a different result had been reported from the actual result on the vote on the motion for the previous question on the resolution of the House (H. Res. 76) by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wanger].

The Speaker announced that, therefore, all proceedings to the erroneous announcement would fall, and that if there be no objection the Journal will be amended to show the fact.

Mr. MANN. That is the precedent to which I had reference.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The question I desire to ask the gentleman is, Suppose the House declines to vacate and votes down the pending motion?

Mr. MANN. Well, the House has that power. No one can question the right of the House, and while the House might lie in its Journal, and while it frequently has provisions appear in the Journal which are not correct, if the Journal was approved with that statement in it no one could controvert it or vacate it unless by direct proceedings.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield? Suppose the House should refuse to adopt the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the Journal should show on its face there was not a quorum voting at the time the previous question was ordered and the House approves the Journal? The Journal then showing that there was not a constitutional quorum present, it seems to me any court or any investigating body would have to hold the proceedings null and void.

Mr. MANN. That will stultify the House, and there is nothing anybody can do about it.

Mr. GARNER. And the reason why it is necessary in the very beginning to hold that they are null and void is that the House would not be permitted to stultify itself.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield? I suggest the Journal as read shows that a quorum was not present, so the Journal, I take it, ought to be approved as it is.

The SPEAKER. The Journal shows exactly what the RECORD shows.

Mr. CANNON. Then there is no necessity of correcting the Journal, and if the Journal is adopted as it is, then it stands upon the motion for the previous question that the gentleman from Texas made.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, it is admitted on all sides that the action taken yesterday as shown by the Journal is a mere nullity. Now, what is the use of the House or the Speaker attempting to vacate a nullity? As the gentleman from Illinois has just said, there is no error in the Journal. We approve the Journal and then the matter stands upon the previous question without declaration from the Speaker or without any action on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Journal shows the fact, except it shows that the Speaker made an erroneous declaration. The way it came about is this: There was great confusion in the House and some of the clerks got the figures wrong and handed up the slip to the Speaker. Of course the Speaker did not count the vote on roll call and the Speaker announced the vote as handed to him.

The Chair is very much inclined to agree that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] are right, but the Chair wants that declaration of the Chair changed. The Chair does not see very well how it can be done, either.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will permit, the Journal shows that the resolution was agreed to by the House——

Mr. GARNER. It was not agreed to; it could not be agreed to in the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Journal shows the correct vote, and the RECORD shows the correct vote, and shows that there was no quorum present.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the Speaker thinks it is not necessary to have a motion to vacate. I am inclined to the opinion that it is not necessary to have that motion.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion, the Speaker will declare the vote vacated.

Mr. CLAYTON. I offered the motion simply in the interest of regularity. That is the reason I offered this motion, but if it can be accomplished—and that seems to be the consensus of opinion—without a motion, I am willing to take the shorthand method and let the Speaker declare the vote vacated, and I therefore withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the Journal agreed to and the proceedings on that roll call and the subsequent proceedings vacated.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the fact, although that call of the House, as I understand it, has gone to the discard and the junk pile, that I am erroneously recorded as voting "aye," when I answered "present."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the Journal is to be corrected accordingly?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There are others who wish to make corrections in the Journal.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I am recorded on the roll call on page 8716 as "not voting." I was present and voted "aye," and I desire to have the RECORD corrected accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Journal and RECORD, without objection, will be corrected accordingly.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the fact that there are two roll calls that should be vacated instead of one because of a very unusual practice which obtained yesterday. There were two separate roll calls on the previous question owing to what seemed to me to be an incorrect ruling of the Speaker pro tempore. I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that 10 or 12 Members voted "aye" on one roll call and voted either "present" or "no" on the other roll call on the same question. The fact is that taking the total of the Members who voted on the two roll calls which, under the ordinary practice of the House, should have been consolidated into a single roll call, a quorum was present. That is what caused the trouble.

I ask that both roll calls be vacated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will declare both roll calls vacated.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ask that my own name on page 8716, be stricken out of the list of those voting "nay" on the previous question. I did not vote, as I was outside the Chamber when the vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. The change will be made, without objection.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, on the two first roll calls yesterday I was absent, attending to important departmental business, and I was under the impression that my general pair with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. FIELDS, was to be put up in case of a record vote, and so informed the pair clerks. But the gentleman, assuming that I was present, voted. The RECORD therefore shows that he was paired with me and votes at the same time. I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD be corrected so as to show him answering "present." I do this with his concurrence.

Mr. FIELDS. That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, on page 8716 of the RECORD of July 8 the roll call shows I was absent. I was present and voted "present." I desire to have the RECORD so show.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, on the roll call on page 8716 I am recorded as voting "nay." I was present and voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. BURNETT. On the last roll call on page 8716 I am recorded as voting "aye." I was paired with the gentleman from North Dakota, Mr. HELGESEN, and voted "present."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved. The vote is on the previous question on the resolution.

PROCEDURE IN CONTEMPT CASES.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered now as ordered, and the resolution adopted, and that three hours' debate be had upon the bill H. R. 22591, and that one-half of that time be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no reason why we should not vote on the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] object?

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the gentleman will not.

Mr. MANN. We will dispose of it in less time than we will by talking about it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the vote will be taken on the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I prefer the same request that I made last night, and that is that the three hours provided for debate on the bill H. R. 22591 be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], I to control one half of the time and he the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent that the three hours be divided equally between himself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one of the most important measures that have been presented to the House during the present session of the Congress. It is to be regretted that the House has been somewhat addicted to the bad habit of not giving sufficient time for the consideration of very grave legal propositions. We all know that the custom of the House is to give elaborate consideration to appropriation bills, and this is proper. Sometimes bills, though of minor importance, are discussed and considered from day to day, so that the views of everybody in respect to the particular measures can be well understood. I say that in grave legal propositions the habit of the House has been too much not to accord to matters brought by the law committee before this House, involving grave questions in some instances, a sufficient time. On yesterday, Mr. Speaker, unexpectedly to the Committee on the Judiciary, to the Members on that side and on this side of the House, we were informed that the rule for the consideration of this particular bill would be brought up and considered yesterday and acted on, and that three hours, instead of five as asked for by the committee, would be given for general debate.

Of course, the Committee on the Judiciary, like the judicial branch of our Government, is largely helpless. It is helpless because it can not control any purse strings. There is not an appropriation committee in this House that can not have more consideration in the matter of ample time for debate upon measures brought from it than is accorded to your law committee, and the reason is that there is no power of patronage, there are no favors on the part of that committee to be bestowed upon anybody. It must bring to you a legal proposition; it has no favors to give to anybody, and it can not ask any favors of anybody.

But I did not intend to take up the time of the House on that matter. I come now at once to the consideration of this bill, and necessarily my time for discussion must be brief, for gentlemen on both sides have asked for more time to discuss this bill than has been accorded to me.

Mr. Speaker, the demand for this legislation has been persistent and long continuing. It has been referred to in platform after platform, in campaign after campaign, and in at least one presidential utterance. It is a matter that has attracted the attention of the country for years. It is a matter that has been before the Senate and the House several times in the past. We recall that in 1896 Senator Hill passed a contempt bill through the Senate. It passed there with practical unanimity, regulating the process of contempt and providing for jury trials in certain cases. We remember that when that bill came to this House, then a Republican House, Mr. Ray, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary at that time, now a Federal judge in the State of New York, reported a substitute for the Hill bill providing for jury trials in certain cases. So that I may say that the judgment of the House, the judgment of the Senate, the judgment of the country, is that jury trials can be had in contempt cases, and, furthermore, that in certain classes of contempt cases jury trials ought to be had.

Now, what has riveted the attention of the Congress and the country upon this matter from time to time has been the abuse of the power to punish for contempt. No man, Mr. Speaker, yields more respect to the courts than I do. It is on account of my respect for the courts, it is on account of my desire to preserve an independent and efficient judiciary, that I favor the regulation of this process to the end that abuses may be eradicated and that the people may not have any just cause to complain against the action of any Federal judge.

I have before me the report to which I have referred, made by Judge Ray on the bill providing for jury trials in certain cases, but I have not the time more than merely to refer to it.

It seems to me if you will read the report made by the Committee on the Judiciary on the pending bill and the views filed by the minority you will see that two questions are presented, first, the power of Congress to regulate proceedings for contempt, and secondly, the policy of regulating proceedings for contempt.

The power of Congress to regulate contempt proceedings has long been settled. In ex parte Robinson (19 Wall.), cited with approval in Bessette v. Conkey (194 U. S., 327), the power of Congress to regulate this process was recognized and proclaimed by the highest court in our land. Let me quote from the latter case:

> The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power, but the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 3, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and power from the Constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt; but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases.
> (1) Where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.
>
> (2) Where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transaction.
> (3) Where there has been disobedience or resistance by an officer, party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts. The law happily prescribes the punishment which the courts can impose for contempts. The seventeenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. L., 73) declares that the court shall have power to punish of their authority in any cause or hearing before them by fine or imprisonment, at their discretion. The enactment is a limitation upon the manner in which the power shall be exercised, and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment. The judgment of the court debarring the petitioner, treated as a punishment for contempt, was therefore unauthorized and void.

And, Mr. Speaker, fundamentally, if there had not been any precedents in support of the contention, these courts which are the creatures of Congress are amenable to the will of Congress. Congress can regulate their processes. It has done so in multiplied instances, and it would be a contradiction of a great principle of natural law, to say nothing of constitutional law, that the creator can not control or regulate his creature. [Applause.]

As to the policy of this measure, I think it must be conceded, for even the President of the United States and the minority in their views have admitted that the process of contempt has been abused; and the minority, following the suggestion of the President, have offered a partial remedy to mitigate that abuse.

The President has suggested that contempt cases be tried before another judge. The minority of this committee suggested that remedy in their substitute. The majority insist that in certain cases the remedy is not trial before another judge or another tribunal but that the remedy is found in trial before a jury in the court having under consideration the contempt matter in the particular case where it involves the liberty of the citizen on a criminal charge.

Much is said in the minority views, and much was said in the hearing about the impropriety or lack of power to give another court jurisdiction of a contempt case; but that argument can not be made against the pending measure, for the reason that there is no pretense in this bill that any other court except the court in which the contempt was committed shall have jurisdiction of the case and try it.

This bill is narrow in its scope. It is narrower than the Hill bill. It is narrower than the law of the State of Kansas in contempt cases. It is narrower than the law of the State of Virginia granting jury trials in certain contempt cases. It is narrower than the law of Colorado in contempt cases, and I believe in some respects even narrower than the law of other States.

I need not go into the difference between the State courts and the Federal courts. We are taught that we have a Government of three coordinate and independent departments; but the Supreme Court has said—and you will find it cited in the report—that the courts of the United States do not have, by their creation, those inherent powers that the courts of the States have or that the English courts have, and the reasons are given in the views expressed by the majority of the committee. I will not undertake to set them out at this time. However, let me make the following quotation from the report which I presented:

> Numerous State cases were cited in argument. They may all be answered as a class. The relation between Congress and Federal courts is not the same as that between State legislature and the State courts. The constitutions of the various States themselves provide for and establish the court, partition the powers of government between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, prescribing safeguards, and defining their powers in detail; whereas the Federal Constitution has delegated full and complete control of the matter to Congress. Nor should the fact be overlooked that the State decisions on the subject are often based upon precedents of the common law, which is no part of the Federal system. Thus, in Ex parte McCowan (139 N. Car., 95), that being typical of many such cases relied upon, it was said:

"We are satisfied that at common law the acts and conduct of the petitioner, as set out in the case, constitute a contempt of court, and if the statute does not embrace this case and in terms repeal the common law applicable to it, we would not hesitate to declare the statute in that respect unconstitutional and void for reasons which we will now state."

In Finck v. O'Neill (106 U. S. Rep., 272) it appeared that Congress has taken from the court all power to enforce its judgment, and the act of Congress was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case (p. 280) the court said:

"The United States can not enforce the collection of a debt from an unwilling debtor, except by judicial process. They must bring a suit and obtain a judgment. To reap the fruit of that judgment they must cause an execution to issue. The courts have no inherent authority to take any one of these steps, except as it may have been conferred by the legislative department; for they can exercise no jurisdiction except as the law confers and limits it."

And in Cary v. Curtiss (3 How., 236, 254) the same court said:

"The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitutions, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription, or by the common law."

This bill amends section 268. I first introduced at this session a bill which was similar to the Hill bill.

Mr. Speaker, the Hill bill proceeded somewhat upon a different line from this bill, but however that may be, this bill proceeds upon the line that in every case which is criminal in its nature the American citizen shall have the inalienable right of trial by jury. That is all this bill seeks to do. Let me repeat, Shall the citizen be deprived of his customary jury trial in a case criminal in its nature and have substituted for the verdict of 12 of his peers the opinion of one judge?

I want to refer as briefly as I may to some objections that were made to the bill that I introduced which followed in some fashion the Hill bill. The first criticism that was made upon that bill and upon the Hill bill, in the hearings had before the committee, was that the bill might be considered as in pari materia section 268 of the judiciary code, formerly section 725 of the Revised Statutes. I think I violate no confidence when I say that that criticism came from the Attorney General of the United States. In framing this bill which is now before the House we met that criticism and obviated it. An examination of this bill will show that section 268 stands independently, and that this bill adds to the law by providing that in cases of a criminal nature, and of a criminal nature only, shall there be a right of trial by jury.

The next objection that was made to it was that it would probably detract from the power of the courts to enforce their decrees of dissolution of combinations denounced by the anti-trust law. I violate no confidence when I say that that was the criticism of the chief legal officer of the present administration, Attorney General Wickersham. We have met that objection by providing in this bill that it shall not apply in any case where the United States is the party complainant. Every man in this House knows that in all proceedings under the Sherman anti-trust law the United States is necessarily, by the terms of the statute, the complainant. So we answered that criticism in this bill.

The next criticism was that it provided for contempt in courts where there were no jurors. We answered that by confining the operation in this bill to the circuit courts, to the courts where there are juries, and we exempt its operation in the courts of appellate jurisdiction. We met that criticism in that way. There has been none that I know of or little, if any, complaint made against abuse of the process of contempt by appellate courts. It has been in the district courts, in the circuit courts, in the courts of first instance, where this abuse has occurred, and this bill limits it in effect to the operation of those courts of the first instance where the abuses have occurred and do now occur.

Another citicism was that the Hill bill covered cases of contempt in which there ought not to be trials by jury—such cases as that in In re Nevitt, One hundred and seventeenth Federal Reporter, page 448, where I believe the facts were that certain county officers were required by the court to levy a tax to pay a judgment. They refused to do it, and they were put in jail, and rightly so, and the court held in that case, and it held in other similar cases of a civil nature, that the man who is imprisoned, that the man who is charged with contempt in such cases, "carries the keys of the prison in his own pocket," and has the power of obtaining his liberty by complying with the civil requirements of the law.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SABATH). Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman prefer that I should not interrupt him now?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would rather the gentleman would let me finish these criticisms. Now, in all cases under this bill where a trustee is ordered to pay over money—and I need not particularize the cases, for every lawyer in this House can at once with his mind's eye sweep the horizon of legal procedure and recognize the numerous cases where the process of contempt ought to be exercised for the enforcement of a civil remedy, and properly so. This bill does not detract from the power of the court in that particular.

Another criticism was that the bill in the nature of 13578 that I introduced, or in the nature of the Hill bill, would give a jury trial in cases of a violation of the decrees of the courts in patent cases. This bill is free from that criticism, and an eminent patent lawyer appeared before the committee in the hearings and argued with great force and effect against the bill 13578, or against the Hill bill; and this bill was amended so as not to interfere with the proper enforcement of any decree made in a patent case. I have a letter approving this bill signed by Walter F. Rogers, of this city of Washington, president of the association of patent lawyers, which I shall take occasion to print in whole or in part in the RECORD.

I want to call the attention of the House briefly to the fact that section 268 of the judicial code was section 725 of the Revised Statutes and to the act of March 2, 1831. Gentlemen will find it all set out in the report which I had the honor to make to this House on this bill.

As a part of the history of the act of 1831, which followed the Peck impeachment case, wherein Judge Peck put in jail a lawyer for making a newspaper publication criticizing him, I would state that after the failure of the impeachment Mr. Buchanan, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, reported the act of 1831 and provided for contempts as now provided in section 268 of the code, and in the second section of that act used the language, a part of which I have just quoted. The purpose of the lawmakers at that time was to take these cases mentioned in the first part of section 268 and let them be subject to summary punishment by the court without the intervention of the jury, and they undertook to make other contempts of court which were criminal in their nature criminal offenses and subject to be proceeded against by information or indictment. The courts have ignored the wisdom of the former Congress in some instances and, instead of keeping on the line of demarcation between the two classes of contempt, the courts of chancery, the courts of the United States sitting in equity, have usurped criminal functions. Let me quote the act of 1831 in full.

Act of March 2, 1831, upon which sections 725, 5399, 5404, 5405, and 5406, Revised Statutes, above quoted, is based, was as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall, corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror, witness, or officer, in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or shall, corruptly, or by threats or force, obstruct, impede, or endeavor to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, every person or persons so offending shall be liable to prosecution therefor by indictment, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense.

Approved, March 2, 1831.

The courts have, under the guise of contempt of court, had men arrested and tried for crimes without the intervention of a jury. That is the reason why this legislation is necessary. This bill is not intended to and does not subtract one iota from the enforcement of any civil remedy or redress that any man has through the chancery court and through its power to punish for contempt, but it says that the chancery court, which was never designed to be a court of criminal jurisdiction, which was never designed to try crimes, shall not be vested with criminal jurisdiction, except that when it does exercise jurisdiction in a criminal case the man charged with crime shall have the Anglo-Saxon, the American right, of being confronted by his accusers, to cross-examine his witnesses, and to be tried by a jury of his peers before his liberty shall be taken from him. [Applause.]

That is all this bill does. Judge Ray in his report on his bill at the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress providing for jury trials said that it was just and right in certain cases. I need not talk to you about the industrial disputes that have arisen from time to time. I need not tell this House of the abuse of these contempt processes sometimes in cases of that kind. It is known to the country, and, Mr. Speaker, even the President in his criticism, which is cited by the minority here, could not find any objection, I believe, to this bill. Please turn to the minority views at the bottom of page 9, and you will find the President quoted as follows:

Under such a provision—

Referring to another bill—

a recalcitrant witness who refuses to obey a subpœna may insist upon a jury trial before the court can determine that he received the subpœna.

We do not do that in the pending bill. We leave section 268 of the Judicial Code intact, and that criticism made by the President aimed at another bill has no application to the bill now before the House. Again referring to another bill he says:

A citizen summoned as a juror and refusing to obey the writ when brought into court must be tried by another jury to determine whether he got the summons.

These criticisms were leveled at another bill. They have no application to this bill, for this bill does not provide for a jury trial in such cases.

Again referring to another bill he says:

A suit may be tried in the court of first instance and carried to the court of appeals and sent to the Supreme Court and a judgment and decree entered and an order, and then if the decree involves the defendant's doing anything or not doing anything, and he disobeys it, the plaintiff, who has pursued his remedies in lawful course for years, must, to secure his rights, undergo the uncertainties and delays of a jury trial before he can enjoy that which is his right by the decision of the highest court of the land.

That is a criticism that was leveled at another bill, and this bill does not provide a jury trial in such cases, for it is by its terms limited to cases of contempt which are criminal in their nature.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. Does the gentleman say that his bill would not apply to a case where a witness or juror in violating an order to appear in court committed a crime?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think it would.

Mr. STERLING. Where in the bill is there any provision that would exclude cases of that kind?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will make that perfectly plain. The bill provides:

SEC. 268 a. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, decree, or command of any district court of the United States by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

Mr. STERLING. Then it must be applicable to that kind of a case.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is the leaven of the lump.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Suppose a case like this, where there was a strike on a railroad engaged in interstate commerce, and the United States courts should enjoin interference with the free passage of trains, say, in and out of a station?

Mr. CLAYTON. The bill on its face says that in any case where the United States is the complainant it has no application. It is to prevent one party litigant in a civil suit invoking this criminal process of the court to oppress his weaker neighbor.

It does not intend to detract and does not detract one iota from the power, the majesty, and the dignity of the United States. The Government of the United States has under this bill every power, even when it becomes a law, to enforce its judgments and its demands that it has now. This bill is to prevent a man or, say, a corporation, rich and powerful, getting out a blanket injunction at midnight, broad as the canopy of heaven in its terms, and then oppressing the poor, humble laborer. The laboring man has the right to strike, and Judge Ray's report, Mr. Olney's letter in the hearings had before the Judiciary Committee in Judge Ray's time, in the Fifty-fourth Congress, set out distinctly that the laborer has a right to strike to better his condition, for his physical and moral uplift, and President after President has reiterated that right and power on the part of the laboring people. This bill is aimed to prevent these blanket midnight injunctions being issued for the purpose of framing up criminal cases, for the purpose of depriving men of the right of trial by jury, and cases gotten up by corporations sometimes to use this power of or rather to abuse the process of contempt to coerce and to threaten the helpless laboring people who have only the jewels of sweat of honest faces to oppose against the almighty dollar.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Surely.

Mr. BUTLER. This measure would not apply in the case of which the gentleman speaks unless some criminal offense had been committed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Surely, if I understand the gentleman's question. In no case can he have the right of trial by jury unless—

By doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law.

Mr. BUTLER. Then a violation of one of these orders of which the gentleman speaks might be punished in the old way——

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; and that is the way the fathers intended all crimes should be punished and the fathers intended to give to every man charged with crime the right of trial by jury. It is one of your birthrights, it is one of your rights which the fathers fought for, it is one of the rights worth dying for. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have consumed more time than I intended. I want to put in the RECORD an eminently respectable article in support of this bill, a letter from Mr. S. S. Gregory, president of the American Bar Association, indorsing and commending this bill. You have heard something already in this campaign, and you will hear it further, about "social justice." You have heard it. You have heard an eminent politician say it, social justice. It is but one way of voicing one part of the demands of a great part of the American people that they shall have legal justice in the courts of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me again?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I learn a good deal by illustration. I have in my mind a question the answer to which may not be helpful to anybody else, but it will be helpful to me if the gentleman will answer it. If one of these injunctions is issued, often as the gentleman has stated, in the nighttime, and the process officer serves it——

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman please ask his question, as my time is already all farmed out?

Mr. BUTLER. The process server goes with his injunction and peacefully serves it. If everything subsequent to the time of service is peacefully and quietly done and no violence is committed, there is nothing in this law to apply.

Mr. CLAYTON. Not a thing on earth. There is nothing in this bill to frighten the heart of even a timid man. No man on this floor has greater respect, I say more than that, greater reverence for the courts than I have. Whenever I go into a courthouse and in the presence of a judge I feel like I am in no ordinary presence. I want the American people to forever cherish and foster that respect for the judiciary, and it is in that view that this bill is offered. If the regulation of process, if the stopping of abuse by process can be done by congressional enactment, can be secured and practiced in the courts, you will hear very much less talk about the recall of judges, you will hear very much less talk about the recall of judicial decisions. I want to say that if we will make the Federal courts conform to good practice just as we have made the State courts conform, you will build up the confidence of the American people in the great judicial department of our Government. [Applause.]

Take this bill and read it. You will find it relates to good practice. Most of this bill is the best practice pursued to-day in many respects by the best courts of the land. Let this good practice work in this wise reformation so as to prevent the abuse of the judicial process of contempt to the end that the courts of our country may live in the respect and confidence of the American people forever. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SABATH). The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak briefly in support of this bill.

The right of trial by jury is a sacred right to every American citizen expressly preserved by the Constitution in all law cases. There is not a man in America who pretends to be imbued with the spirit of our institutions who would stand one moment for the abolishment of the right of trial by jury in cases at law. It is true the right of trial by jury in cases of equity is an innovation in practice in so far as the Federal Government is concerned, but we believe that innovation is justified by existing conditions in the United States, and for that reason the Committee on the Judiciary have brought this bill before the House, and to-day ask that it be approved by the House.

I desire to call your attention briefly to what the bill accomplishes. In the first place, it does not affect any contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near the court as to interfere with its proceedings. The law is left in respect to that class of contempts exactly as it is now and has existed heretofore. It is also limited to proceedings in the district courts of the United States, which courts have proper machinery for juries. It does not apply to any case in which the United States is a party. So it leaves all the powers that exist in the Government at present undisturbed by its passage. The purpose of this bill is to prevent injustice in certain classes of cases which chiefly grow out of labor disputes, where great and powerful corporations, on the one hand, go into the Federal courts and seek to enforce their decrees and judgments against laboring people.

This bill provides for a trial by jury only in cases where the contempt is committed outside of the presence of the court and the issue to be tried by the jury is a question of fact. When a proceeding for contempt is instituted, when a party is charged with violating the order of the court and being in contempt by reason of acts committed at some place remote and distant from the court, the question of fact as to whether or not that man has violated such order and is guilty of contempt, if the act or thing alleged to have been done amounts to a crime under the laws of the United States, or under the common law, on the demand of the accused it is to be determined by a trial by jury.

That is precisely what this bill contemplates and is all that it accomplishes. It does not put it in the power of the jury to fix the punishment. The fixing of the punishment is left to the determination of the court, and may be either fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. The jury determines the naked question of fact as to the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Where, under the present practice, may injustice be done? I will give you an illustration. An injunction is issued, as has been well said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], of the blanket kind, covering all parties litigant and a great number of other persons. A powerful corporation, with a force of detectives vigilant and active in behalf of their masters, and none too scrupulous in their methods, make a charge against an individual in some remote part of the country, far distant from the court, alleging that he has been guilty of contempt, and the alleged facts upon which such charge is based would constitute a crime either under the statute laws of the United States or under the common laws of England. In such case the accused under the present practice must be tried by the court. But under the provisions of this bill the question of fact as to whether or not this individual is guilty of the acts with which he is charged may be determined by a trial by jury. And that is all there is to it.

It is contended that to provide for a jury trial in such cases is a reflection upon the court. Why? All criminal offenses, including the graver ones, those involving life and liberty under the Constitution, must be tried by a jury. Is it any disrespect to the law court or the judges thereof that jury trials must be preserved? All persons charged with crimes must be tried by jury. Is it any disrespect to the courts to so require? No. It is an advantage and protection to the courts, because judgments that are rendered in conformity with opinions of unbiased jurors, the verdict of 12 men, are more satisfactory to the public, and hence the judgment of the courts based upon such verdicts are more satisfactory to all parties concerned than if they are rendered by the judgment of one man. For exact and unfailing justice I would rather depend on a jury, the unbiased judgment of 12 men, than on the individual opinion of any judge whoever sat in any court in Christendom.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the distinction in the bill as to the term "presence of the court"? How does the bill define that language?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will read you that provision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Give us your definition of it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. My definition of it would be that the provision would apply to any act committed in the immediate presence of the court or so near the courthouse as to disturb the proceedings of the court. Such contempts are not affected by this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. An interpretation of proceedings of that kind by a court is actively or constructively. What do you mean by constructive presence?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, I would construe it to mean in the immediate presence of the court, or so near the court that the acts would create a disturbance of the court or of its proceedings. That is as good a definition as I could give you of the meaning of the provision referred to. But that class of cases is not interfered with in this bill in any way whatsoever.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is contended in the minority report that this proposed bill is unconstitutional, that its provision for trial by jury violates the Constitution. Upon that question I want to submit a few observations: The inferior courts of the United States are created by Congress. Their jurisdiction is conferred by Congress. It is within the power of Congress to abolish these courts. They exercise no jurisdiction except what the Congress confers upon them, and it is within the power and the jurisdiction of the Congress to regulate their proceedings.

Permit me to submit an extract from the first judiciary act ever adopted after the adoption of the Constitution—the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, section 17:

That all the said courts of the United States shall have power to grant new trials in cases where there has been a trial by jury for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law; (a) and shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oath or affirmations, and to punish by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of said courts, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same; (b) and to make and establish all necessary rules for the orderly conducting business in the said courts, provided such rules are not repugnant to the laws of the United States.

In this first judiciary act, passed by the First Congress, composed of the men who, in large part, made the Constitution, Congress interpreted its power under the Constitution, and gave to the courts the right to make any rules and regulations for the administration of their affairs that were not repugnant to the laws of the United States, which means not repugnant to the Constitution and to the acts of Congress. Hence, I contend that we have the constitutional right to regulate in every respect the procedure of those courts of inferior jurisdiction which the Congress has created.

In 1831 Congress undertook to regulate contempts in Federal courts.

Act of March 2, 1831, upon which sections 725, 5399, 5404, 5405, and 5406, Revised Statutes, is based, was as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall, corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror, witness, or officer, in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or shall, corruptly, or by threats or force, obstruct, impede, or endeavor to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, every person or persons so offending shall be liable to prosecution therefor by indictment, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense.

Approved, March 2, 1831.

Subsequent acts have been passed supplementing the act of 1831, and the constitutionality of these several acts has been upheld by the Supreme Court.

We close this head with the quotation from Ex parte Robinson (19 Wall., 505), cited with approval in the case of Bessette v. Conkey (194 U. S., 327), which is so clearly and obviously applicable and conclusive that no comment appears to be necessary:

The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power, but the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 3, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and power from the Constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt; but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases.

(1) Where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.

(2) Where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transaction.

(3) Where there has been disobedience or resistance by an officer, party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts. The law happily prescribes the punishment which the courts can impose for contempts. The seventeenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. L., 73), declares that the court shall have power to punish of their authority in any cause or hearing before them by fine or imprisonment, at their discretion. The enactment is a limitation upon the manner in which the power shall be exercised, and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment. The judgment of the court debarring the petitioner, treated as a punishment for contempt, was therefore unauthorized and void.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that in this bill we are merely seeking to regulate procedure in cases of contempt by guaranteeing the right of trial by jury in certain cases therein named. In so doing Congress will act within the clear scope of its constitutional authority. It is also just and right and in keeping with sound policy. I hope the bill will pass.

I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] requests that all gentlemen may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days.

Mr. MANN. For everybody?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. For everybody or only for those who speak?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will modify my request and confine it to those who have made remarks.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had better withhold that request until later.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I withdraw my request, Mr. Speaker, for the present.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks in the RECORD, as I did not get time to get through with them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Nobody objects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time has been consumed by the proponents of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] to consume that much time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STERLING. I will.

[Mr. CANNON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] makes the same request. Is there objection?

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] makes the same request. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that a number of gentlemen desire to extend their remarks in the RECORD. I think some of them would prefer to be heard in the House. I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate upon the bill be extended two hours, so as to add one hour to the time controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and one hour to the time controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], without making that a part of the request.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker, but I want to make this statement in connection with it before I agree to it. I suppose that means that we come to a vote on this bill to-morrow, does it?

Mr. MANN. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday. I suppose we will come to a vote on this bill certainly Thursday, right after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the criticism was made upon me yesterday that I was at times a little too accommodating; but I have been accommodated so often by the membership of this House, particularly on the other side of the aisle, and I have been impressed so often with the wisdom of the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that I am inclined to concur in his suggestion. I believe in many instances had his suggestions been followed the time of the House would have been economized. I think it is but just to him to say that. In view of the fact that a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House have expressed a desire to speak on the subject, and in view of the fact that I myself made some complaint in the beginning of my remarks against the limited time, and for other reasons, I am disposed to agree to the suggestion made by the minority leader [Mr. MANN] and to concur in the request that this debate be extended for two hours, one hour of that time to be controlled by myself and one hour by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

I am informed that to-morrow, being Calendar Wednesday, there will be no objection on that side to the taking of the vote on this bill the first thing on Thursday. If I am incorrect about that, I would like the Chair to correct me; or if there is any dissent from it, I would like to hear it now; that on Thursday next, the first thing after the approval of the Journal and any little routine business, we shall vote on the passage of this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] will offer his bill as a substitute for the main proposition, and if that is voted down, which I apprehend it will be largely by the votes of gentlemen on the opposite side of the aisle, then the main proposition will be in order, namely, the passage of this bill; and after the disposition of this contempt bill, then it is my purpose—and I understand it will be in order—for me to get up for further consideration the impeachment matter against Judge Archbald and ask for the action of the House upon it at that time.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Why would it not be possible for us to get to a vote on this bill to-night, even with the additional two hours' debate? That would only take us to about 20 minutes before 6.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that the request which I made does not interfere with the taking of the vote. That is a matter to be disposed of later; and if there should be no vote to-night, there certainly will be no objection on this side to the procedure suggested by the gentleman from Alabama on Thursday.

Mr. CLAYTON. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and also for the benefit of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], that I do not believe two hours from now it will be possible for us to have a quorum here. I am a practical legislator whenever I can legislate at all. I am going to be here and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] is going to be here, just as we are always here, but some gentlemen are away from the House now, as the gentleman may know, upon other business. Perhaps some of them may be engaged in Chautauqua lectures. The gentleman and I always stay here, and so does our other friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. We shall be here, as the old saying in the country is, until the cows come home.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is a lot of other legislation that is pressing for consideration, which ought to be considered by this House, so that it can be passed and sent to the Senate. It seems to me we ought to be able to get to a vote on this question. I have no objection to the extension of the time.

Mr. CANNON. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON]? It is exceedingly hot weather, and in my judgment better progress will be made if we provide for a vote immediately after the approval of the Journal on Thursday. That will be in the interest both of the conservation of health and of getting a quorum and obtaining results.

Mr. CLAYTON. I agree with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, not for the purpose of avoiding the heat of the afternoon, because I believe it would do us good to stay here and work and sweat instead of going down to a Turkish bath and paying $2. Let us stay here and engage in good, honest work, and a good honest sweat will do us good. I may say to my friend that I see a little suggestion made in the newspaper press that another body wants to get away from here early.

Well, there may be some decrepit old fellows somewhere else that want to get away early, but the time has come now that this Congress ought to stay here until the public business is dispatched. We have not the time next winter to attend to the business properly, and if a man can not stay here in the summer time and attend to the public business he ought to quit Congress and let some one come here who can attend to it. Now, this does not refer to our young friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Laughter.] For about 15 years I have seen him here when the House was called to order and when the gavel fell for the last time. I have seen him here at every roll call; and, in fact, sometimes when the Republicans—then in the majority—wanted to keep a quorum here and I did not want to keep a quorum here I was sorry that he was such a close attendant. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me in his time, I want to thank him for the compliment. I enjoyed the lecture he gave to the Democratic side with 60 majority. The minority will be here. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I was not lecturing the House, because the Members of the House are generally in attendance except a few who are unavoidably absent and a few others who are away on lecturing tours or other private business to the detriment of the public business, which they are paid to attend to here at Washington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SABATH). The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate be extended for two hours and the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Illinois and himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, it is very important, in order to cast an intelligent vote on this bill, to know what it contains and what effect it will have on the administration of justice in the courts. If gentlemen have followed what was said to-day by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and what was said yesterday by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] there is a very great possibility that they will be misled as to what the real purpose of the bill is.

The gentlemen say that it is to correct abuses in contempt cases. They talk of the vast number of abuses that have been committed by the courts in punishment for contempt for violations of the orders and decrees of the court. None of them so far have referred to a single instance in any court of the United States where the power to punish for contempt has been abused. They do not specify. It would seem better, if they want to carry conviction to the minds of the Members, that they point out at least some instances where the courts and judges have committed abuses in punishment for contempt. They have not done so, and they will not do so. They will not be able to point out anywhere in all the reports of all the Federal courts of the United States any very serious cases where the judges have abused the power to punish for contempt.

Both gentlemen have proceeded from a false premise. They assume that the trial of a contempt case is a trial of a criminal case. Now, that is not true. In no instance is the trial of a contempt case the trial of a criminal case. When they contend that all men charged with crime should be allowed the inalienable right of trial by jury they are contending for that which all men have and which no one would deny to any man.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman just stated that in no case could the trial for contempt be construed to be a criminal trial. In the case of a constructive contempt, where the complaint against whom the injunction has been issued is charged with being guilty of malicious trespass, with having destroyed property, does not that raise the question of a criminal offense?

Mr. STERLING. Not at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to hear the gentleman discuss the distinction between a case of that sort and a criminal offense.

Mr. STERLING. I will undertake to do so. If a man in a case of that kind commits a crime in violating the order of the court, he can be indicted and tried for the crime itself, and with that the court in the trial of the contempt case has nothing whatever to do.

The only thing in which the court is concerned is the violation of its order. Its duty is to enforce the order and to impose such punishment, and only such punishment, as will result in obedience to the order. That is all the court has to do in the trial and punishment for contempt. The man who committed the contempt, if in so doing he committed a crime, can be punished for the crime only by indictment and trial by jury.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Might I ask if it is not a fact that before the court imposes a fine or a sentence of imprisonment that he will have to find as a matter of fact that the defendent is guilty of the crime?

Mr. STERLING. Not at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He will have to find him guilty of the fact.

Mr. STERLING. Not under the law as it stands now.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How does he acquire the right to impose the fine?

Mr. STERLING. He acquires the right to impose the punishment because of the contempt, because the order of the court has been violated, and it is immaterial to the court whether the acts constituting the contempt are such as to constitute a crime or not. He is concerned only in maintaining the authority of the court. The court is bound to enforce the rights of the litigants as he has found them, and to do so may punish for contempt, even though no crime is involved in the commission of the contempt.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it not a question of fact as to whether or not the order of injunction has been violated?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly it is; and that is the only question. The bill provides that if in the violation of the court's order the party has committed a crime he is entitled to trial for contempt by jury; and if he has not committed a crime in violating the order he is not entitled to a trial by jury, and yet the court can try and punish him for contempt.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit, Mr. Speaker, this bill makes an exception in the event that it is a direct contempt, committed in the presence of or near to the court. A man may take the life of another, or attempt to, and in that case it is a crime; and yet the inalienable right of a trial by jury, so eloquently declaimed by the gentleman from Alabama, avails nothing, provided the contempt be in the presence of the court.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, at that point I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the man could not be tried for the assault or the attempt at murder except by jury. He might be tried for contempt in the presence of the court, but he would still be entitled to a trial by jury for the offense.

Mr. STERLING. That is true, and that answers practically all that has been said upon that side of the House in favor of the bill. It answers all arguments put forth about the right of trial by jury where a man has committed a crime. The man is entitled to a trial by jury if he commits a murder or an assault in the presence of the court or elsewhere.

Mr. CANNON. But he can be imprisoned by the court for contempt.

Mr. STERLING. For contempt of court, for disturbing the orderly procedure of the court.

Mr. KENDALL. That is a direct contempt in the presence of the court, and it is not included in this bill at all.

Mr. STERLING. It will apply to other cases just the same.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Why has it become necessary to provide a trial by jury in cases of assault in violation of the law? Why not leave it entirely to the judgment of the court?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, that has been the law for ages. It was the law of England centuries ago and is the law everywhere in America. It is the law because it is the outgrowth of the wisdom of mankind. We all agree that it is a salutary law. We can not take away nor add to the right or privilege of one charged with crime to be tried by a jury of his peers.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is not a privilege, it is a right.

Mr. KENDALL. A constitutional right.

Mr. STERLING. Nobody is denying the right of trial by jury when one is charged with crime. This bill does not provide for trial by jury when charged with crime. That is already the law. This bill provides for trial by jury when a man is charged with contempt of court. It is not worth while for gentlemen to undertake to inject into this argument the idea that this is giving somebody a right of trial by jury when he is charged with crime. It is not in the bill. That is the law now. It has been the law for centuries, and you are simply begging the proposition when you stand before this House and tell us that a man ought to be entitled to a trial by jury when he commits a crime.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Suppose the judge issues an order which enjoins one from committing acts which are already in violation of the law, and suppose a man does commit violence, is it not a fact that there are cases where the judge has sentenced him for contempt of court in place of giving him the right of trial by jury under the law?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; and he ought to sentence him if he is in contempt.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But he ought to be given a chance to prove whether he is guilty or not.

Mr. STERLING. He is always given the chance to purge himself of contempt, and this bill does not add to his rights in that regard.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Would not the same reasons that make it salutary to have a trial by jury in cases of assault and in other criminal cases equally apply in cases of contempt?

Mr. STERLING. No; not at all. It involves an entirely different principle. You are striking down the arm of the court, which preserves the rights of the citizen, when you take away his power to punish for contempt. That is why it is not salutary, and I shall come to that later.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the gentleman mean to say that we take away the power to punish for contempt in this bill?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; that is what I say. I will give my reasons for saying it.

I do not want to yield further for the present; I may later. Before I take up the bill I want to refer to another matter to which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] referred. He read from the minority report, in which I quote the letter of the President when he accepted the nomination four years ago. I want to call attention to the absolute error the gentleman made in his comment on that letter. President Taft in his letter spoke with great force against legislation of this kind, and gave as an illustration this:

Under such a provision a recalcitrant witness who refuses to obey a subpœna may insist on a jury trial before the court can determine that he received the subpœna.

The gentleman says that this bill is not applicable to that kind of a case. Well, it is. Now, I will read the first section of the bill and show that it provides explicitly for just that kind of a case.

That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him shall be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense, etc., shall be proceeded against for said contempt as hereinafter provided.

Now, if a witness is subpœnaed and he assaults the officer who serves the subpœna, he is entitled to a trial by jury for contempt of court under this bill. It expressly applies to that very case.

Mr. KENDALL. How is the man to be punished for failure to obey the subpœna?

Mr. STERLING. He is punished for contempt.

Mr. KENDALL. He is not entitled to trial by jury for that.

Mr. STERLING. He would be under this bill if he committed contempt by assaulting the officer.

Mr. MANN. He can protect himself by hitting an officer.

Mr. McCALL. Would not that give a premium by inducing him to commit a crime by assaulting the officer?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. He would have conferred on him the right of trial by jury.

Mr. McCALL. That is, he would get the right to trial by jury if he resists the officer by assaulting him, whereas if he did not he would not get that right.

Mr. STERLING. That is it, exactly.

Mr. KENDALL. Does the gentleman claim the contempt would consist of the assault upon the officer if the man obeys the subpœna of the court?

Mr. STERLING. The contempt in that case, if he obeys the subpœna, would consist in interfering with an officer and the orderly procedure of the court. Even though he obey the subpœna, he might be in contempt of the court.

Mr. STERLING. Let us see where this bill leads to. The gentleman from Texas yesterday discussed this bill in remarks on the rule. He evidently did not know which bill had been reported. He explained that it classified contempts into direct and indirect contempts. Now, it does not do anything of the kind. The original bill introduced by the gentleman from Alabama did classify contempts into direct and indirect contempts and gave the right of trial by jury in cases of indirect contempts and not where the contempt was direct. That is the kind of a bill the Democratic platform declares for. That platform does not indorse this kind of legislation. It reiterates the platform of 1896, 1904, and 1908 with reference to contempts.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, I want to say to the gentleman right in this connection when he talks about the Democratic platform, the gentleman will recollect the Hoar-Grosvenor injunction Republican bill; the gentleman will recollect the Ray trial by jury for contempt bill reported to this House by a Republican committee. Now, does the gentleman think that his very, very mild substitute here for the pending bill complies either with the views expressed in the Hoar-Grosvenor or in the Ray bill heretofore approved of by the Republican Party?

Mr. STERLING. I do not see how that affects the question. Those gentlemen had no authority from the Republican Party. That party never approved any of those bills. You can not find a single Republican platform that has favored any such legislation as your anti-injunction bill or your contempt bill. Nor can you find in history where any Republican candidate has indorsed such legislation.

I want to read that plank of the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore very recently, as follows:

We repeat our declarations of the platform of 1908 as follows:
"We reiterate the pledge of our national platform of 1896 and 1904 in favor of the measure which passed the United States Senate in 1895, relating to contempts in Federal courts and providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt."

This bill is not in compliance with that platform. It does not classify contempts into direct and indirect contempts, giving privilege of trial by jury in indirect contempt. This bill provides that a man is entitled to a trial by jury if he commits a contempt of court, if in the commission thereof he commits a crime. I will agree with the gentleman that the right of trial by jury is a blessed and a sacred privilege, but I can not understand why a man who violates an order of court by committing crime should be entitled to that blessed and sacred privilege when the man who commits the lesser offense, when the man who commits the contempt of court without committing crime, is deprived of that blessed privilege.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield once more.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state as to whether his substitute provides a trial by jury for all of those?

Mr. STERLING. The substitute does not provide for trial by jury in any kind of a case. I will come to that later.

Now, why that distinction in favor of the man who commits crime? Why give him some special privilege? Why give him that inalienable right of trial by jury, when the man who by carelessness or inadvertence violates the order of the court is denied that right?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to answer the gentleman.

Mr. STERLING. I will answer it myself, and I will answer it to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Alabama.

Suppose an officer goes out to serve a subpœna or a summons, and the party served commits a crime—commits contempt of court by assaulting the officer. He is entitled to trial by jury under this bill when he is brought before the judge for contempt. Another citizen is served with subpœna or summons to act as a witness or juror, and he simply neglects to appear before court to perform his duty as a juror or to testify in the case on trial. He can be punished summarily by a court under this bill, and is not entitled to a trial by jury. Now, I submit to you, gentlemen, how does that kind of a law comport with your sense of justice and with your ideas of equality between men?

But that is not the worst feature of the classification which they make in this bill. It provides that these trials for contempt shall conform as nearly as may be with practice in criminal cases; that is to say, the same rules of evidence will apply when a man is being prosecuted under this law for contempt as would apply if he were being prosecuted under an indictment for crime. You can not convict a man in this country, either in the Federal or in the State courts, of crime, unless you prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. You must remove from the minds of the jury all reasonable doubt before he can be punished for crime. I agree that that is a salutary law, too. I would not change it in the prosecution of criminal cases at all, but that cloak of safety is not thrown around the man who commits a contempt of court without committing a crime. He may be deprived of his liberty on a different and lesser degree of proof. The less offender, the man who has committed no crime, the man who is simply negligent or who has carelessly violated the order of the court, can be convicted of contempt without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Thus you give to the graver offender the benefit of all doubt, while as to the lesser offender you convict him on a mere preponderance of evidence. Is that in harmony with our ideas of justice and equality?

Now, there is another provision to which I wish to refer, and one about which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] talked with great gusto. Section 268d provides that the provisions of the bill do not apply in cases to which the United States is a party. Advocates of the measure refer to this section with just pride, as if to say: The bill may be bad—very bad—but, thank God, it is not all bad, for here in this section we have made an exception of a very large class of cases, to wit, those to which the United States is a party.

Why this exception? It simply means that they do not want to deprive the courts of their powers to enforce their orders and decrees in cases where the Government is a party. It is the only reason that they can assign for excepting that kind of cases.

Well, if a man is not entitled to a trial by jury when he violates an order of court in a case to which the United States is a party, why should he be entitled to a trial by jury in any other case? They admit, by that exception, that the bill will destroy the efficiency and authority of the courts in that kind of a case, and it answers every argument they offer in favor of the bill. It is simply an admission on their part that their bill is bad, and that they will not undertake to extend it all along the line.

Have they assigned any reason for the distinction? Have they undertaken to tell us why there should be a trial by jury for the violation of an order of court in one kind of a case and not in another? The rights of litigants in the one are as sacred as in the other. All are equal before the law. That doctrine may seem plain and old-fashioned to some of you, but I get it from the Declaration of Independence and from the Constitution.

This exception serves one good purpose in this argument. It makes it perfectly clear that the Democratic Party wants to make it appear to one part of American citizenship that it seeks to favor it in legislation. They admit that its main application will be in suits arising out of labor disputes. It feels that this is an opportune time to show some partiality toward this great class of American voters. I have a much higher opinion of American wage earners than that. I have a deep-seated faith that of all Americans the laboring man and the farmer are the most bitterly opposed to class legislation. We should not be misled by so-called labor leaders, who sometimes urge upon us legislation of this kind in their zeal to make it appear to their constituents that they are accomplishing something for their benefit. These men—the farmers and laboring men of America—are the very foundation of our civilization, and their fundamental doctrine has been from colonial days to the present hour the equality of all men. I have thought sometimes that if Congress were only as diligent in their duty to prevent class legislation as this great part of American citizenship is in their demand against it we would appear much more respectable before the country.

I believe it is true that in the last 25 years the Democratic Party, each time it has been in power in either branch of Congress, just before a presidential election has passed an unconstitutional income-tax law, an unconstitutional anti-injunction law, and an unconstitutional contempt bill, and this is no exception to the rule. I want to say to you frankly that your hope in this case is that this bill will never reach the Supreme Court until after the coming election. It is simply a matter of political exigency on the part of the Democratic Party to make it appear that they are undertaking to do something for the laboring men of the United States. That is the reason why they bring this bill in here now. That is the reason why the Senate passed the bill in 1895 on this question.

I can not believe that good lawyers on either side of this House will undertake to say that we have a right to take away from the courts the power to punish for contempt. I can not understand, in the face of the decisions and in the commonsense view of the proposition, how one can seriously contend that Congress may take away from the courts any of their judicial powers. Now, what is judicial power? Congress did not confer judicial power on the courts and we can not take it away. The Constitution conferred that power. I will read you the clause in the Constitution which expressly provides where the judicial power shall be placed:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

That Constitution confers the judicial power on the Supreme Court and on the district courts alike, because that is one of the courts which Congress did in the course of time ordain and establish. We have no right to confer such power, and we have no power to take it away.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman contend that Congress has not the power, in creating the subordinate courts other than the Supreme Court of the United States, to limit their jurisdiction and power and prescribe what power the inferior courts can have, or even abolish all inferior courts if it sees fit?

Mr. STERLING. Well, we will see about that. The trouble with the gentleman is that he does not distinguish between jurisdiction and judicial power. We have got a right to establish and ordain courts and prescribe their jurisdiction. We can say over what territory, persons, property, and subjects their power shall extend. We can say to what class of cases their power shall go. But we can not take away from them any judicial power which the Constitution gave them to decide cases and to enforce their decrees within the jurisdiction which we did give them.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman's argument, but will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Take the matter of the Commerce Court, for instance, recently investigated, where the question was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. That is an inferior court, created by Congress, and yet Congress did limit its power and its judicial power, and the Supreme Court held that Congress could do so.

Mr. STERLING. I do not agree with the gentleman on that. Congress limited the jurisdiction of that court. Congress can limit the jurisdiction of any court that it creates; but the Constitution confers judicial power on the courts that we do create. The instant that we create them, the instant that Congress has spoken, then the Constitution clothes them with the power to decide cases that are submitted to them of a judicial character, and to enforce the decrees which they render in those cases. That is judicial power, and that is all that judicial power is.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does not the Constitution also define the cases to which that power shall extend?

Mr. STERLING. It says that power shall extend to all cases at law and in equity.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Arising under the Constitution and laws?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Then, does it not specify further the cases that arise under the Constitution, leaving the remainder to arise under the laws?

Mr. STERLING. What is the difference how they arise, whether under the Constitution, under laws, or under treaties? We could not even interfere with jurisdiction where the Constitution confers jurisdiction. The judicial power is a well-defined power. It is the power to decide cases and to enforce the decisions. That is all it is.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to cite two cases that would correct the error under which the gentleman labors.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman from Alabama may cite cases where Congress has regulated the judicial power, as the opinions state. The Supreme Court has said this: That when a court exercises the judicial power beyond the point necessary to maintain its efficiency and dignity, then Congress can prohibit such exercise of judicial power. That is as far as the Supreme Court has gone. It has said that legislatures and Congress could regulate the judicial power, to the extent that the court could not exercise that power beyond the point necessary to maintain its authority and its dignity. That is all the courts have held on that point, and I think I will be able to read from some decisions that will satisfy every fair-minded man as to just what the law is on that point.

Imagine a court that has the power to decide a case and no power to enforce its decrees. Imagine a court that has the power to enter orders and make decrees, and yet when those orders and decrees are violated—orders and decrees for the preservation of the peace of society, for the protection of life and property and the comfort and welfare of mankind—can not enforce those orders and decrees. Suppose you say to a court, "You may enter an order or a decree, but if that order or decree is violated then another tribunal must intervene to determine whether or not you may punish the violation of that order."

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asked me if I considered that this was taking away from the courts the power to punish for contempt? Yes; it is taking away from the courts the power to punish for contempt, and leaving it in the hands of a jury of laymen, who, although they may rank among the most intelligent and best class of citizens in the country, yet are not qualified to determine, very often, whether or not an intricate order of the court or an injunction or a decree has been violated. It impairs the power of the court by allowing a jury to intervene to determine whether or not a contempt has been committed, and to that extent destroys its efficiency.

Observe, gentlemen, this bill does not provide that the jury shall simply determine the fact as to whether or not a certain act has been committed. An American jury is always qualified to determine the facts in a case, but the judge should determine the law.

It does not stop there. It provides that a jury shall not only determine whether certain acts have been committed but provides that the jury shall determine whether or not these acts are a violation of the order of the court. It involves questions of law to be submitted to the jury, and the court would be absolutely helpless to protect the rights and property of American citizens if he happens to get an adverse jury.

Under this bill prosecution for contempt would be subject to the delays and uncertainties incident to jury trials. This would be true in a measure even in law courts, of which the jury is a component part. Much of the time even these courts have no jury at hand. Under such conditions a jury must be drawn from the whole body of the people of the district, which would result in delay. The bill takes no account of a disagreement of the jury or a failure to reach a verdict, and this would require the impaneling of another jury; and thus it will be seen that the authority of the court will be greatly weakened by delay and uncertainty and the administration of justice greatly impeded by reason thereof.

It is very clear, however, that this bill is not intended, in its application, for contempt cases in the law courts. It aims at the courts of equity and seeks to impair their judicial power, by the intervention of a jury, to enforce their orders and decrees. This intervention of a jury in courts of equity, to determine questions of law and fact, is an innovation in practice unknown in the whole history of equity jurisprudence, and he who espouses it assumes the burden of showing it is a real reform and not a mere political exigency. Courts of equity have no jury nor the means of securing one. These courts grew up by reason of the very fact that they apply principles of justice and equity to the affairs of men which may be better administered by the chancellor than by a jury. They came as a necessity, to do justice in those cases where the rigid rules of law either wrought or permitted a hardship. This bill proposes to strip these courts of their true character as courts of equity and thus tie the hands of the chancellor in the administration of justice by the introduction of rules of practice which belong only to the courts of law.

It does violence to the experience of the centuries that equity principles are best administered through the conscience of the chancellor. It is inconsistent, indeed it is folly, to confer upon courts of equity the judicial power to try and determine causes in equity and to then intervene between that court and the enforcement of its decrees another tribunal unknown to equity practice.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. STERLING. I will.

Mr. MANN. If my colleague will yield, I would like to ask him one question about section 1. That section provides that certain contempts shall be tried by a jury when the character of the act is such as to constitute a criminal offense. How and when will that be determined? Here an alleged contempt has been committed. Is the court first to hear the facts and determine whether the offense is a criminal offense, and thereupon abandon proceedings before the judge and turn it over to the jury, or, on the other hand, must every case be first submitted to the jury, and if the jury finds it was not a criminal offense thereupon the court itself determines the offense? In other words, in every case submitted to a jury, if the jury finds that the man is not guilty the judge can proceed to punish the man. [Laughter.]

Mr. STERLING. I will say that I can not answer that question. It is one of the inconsistencies of this bill. The bill makes no provision for determining whether the contempt involves a crime or not. I do not know how the court would proceed. I think the court might proceed just as the gentleman suggests, and might either call a jury, and if the jury finds that no crime was committed, then the court can punish for contempt. Or he might try the case first and decide himself whether a crime was committed, and if he finds that a crime was committed he can try it again and let the jury determine the case. It is a very serious criticism of the bill, and I think the point that the gentleman from Illinois makes is worthy of consideration.

Mr. BERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. BERGER. Does the gentleman from Illinois mean to say that in a case where there has been no crime committed, if there is no criminal contempt, the man may be punished anyway?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; for a contempt without a trial by jury.

Mr. BERGER. Without a trial by jury?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BERGER. Then, Mr. Speaker, this bill is a gold brick. [Laughter.]

Mr. STERLING. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is worse than a gold brick. I do not believe gentlemen will be able to deceive the people of this country by legislation of this kind, passed at this time on the eve of a presidential election, with the hope, the certain hope, that it will not reach the courts for consideration of its constitutionality until after the presidential election.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to ask the gentleman how he interprets the language on page 4, which reads:

SEC. 268d. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. That simply means this: That in a case that is brought in the name of the United States, or is prosecuted in behalf of the United States, where the court would enter an order or a decree and it should be violated, that the man who violates it, the man thus guilty of contempt, is not entitled to a trial by jury. Now, I can not tell the gentleman why they make that distinction except that they want to make it appear to certain classes of American citizens that they are doing something for their benefit alone. If they made it apply to all cases, they would do so much harm and their bill would be so utterly indefensible that it would be condemned by every American citizen. So, although they were willing to do some harm for the benefit of the Democratic campaign, they really do not want to do any more harm than is necessary to meet the exigencies of the political situation. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will recall that I asked the chairman of the committee a short time ago whether this bill would apply in the case of an injunction issued by a United States court to prevent interference with the transmission of mail, and he replied that this bill would not apply in a case of this nature.

Mr. STERLING. That would depend entirely on whether the Government was a party to the suit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But suppose the United States court issues an injunction to prevent interference with the free transportation of mail, does that not make the United States Government a party?

Mr. STERLING. Assuming that the bill for the injunction was filed by the railroad company that carried the mail, this exception would not apply, because the Government would not be a party to the suit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman means that if the railroad company applied for the injunction it would not apply?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] agree to that?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, except by permission of the gentleman from Illinois I could not undertake to answer the question.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, I will yield briefly to the gentleman.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to know whether or not he would want me to give a categorical answer to the proposition?

Mr. STERLING. I do not want the gentleman to take up too much of my time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will state, what I said in the beginning, that this bill, wherever the Government of the United States is a party to it, does not have any application, and I adhere to that position. But I say that wherever it is a question between private persons, be they corporations or individuals, this bill has application. I do not know how I can make it any plainer than that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What I am trying to ascertain is when the Government becomes a party.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have not the floor and I could not answer a question which he may desire to put. He seems to have some very acute ideas upon this proposition, and I would like to answer the gentleman if I have the time. In my own time I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in the case the gentleman from Ohio refers to it would not come within the exception.

Mr. CANNON. In the Debs case the Government did not bring the action.

Mr. STERLING. No; the so-called Debs case was an ex parte proceeding brought by Debs by way of habeas corpus to be discharged from a commitment for contempt.

Mr. MANN. Did the Government not bring the action in that case?

Mr. STERLING. It did.

Mr. MANN. I think the Government filed a suit at Chicago to prevent interference with the mails.

Mr. STERLING. It did; and it was for violation of the injunction in that case that Debs was committed for contempt.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But suppose the railroad had originally made the application for the injunction?

Mr. MANN. Then it would not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the courts thereafter granted the injunction.

Mr. MANN. It would not come within the exception in the case of an order where the railroad was the complainant, but where the Government of the United States appeared as the complainant, then this would not affect the existing right to trial before the judge.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What I am trying to get at is this: If the order issues enjoining interference with the free transportation of mail, does that not of itself make the Government a party to the suit?

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. LONGWORTH. No matter by whom it is brought.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It is not a case where the Government is a party to the suit. It is a case where the suit is to be prosecuted by the Government.

Mr. LONGWORTH. "Brought or prosecuted in the name of or in behalf of."

Mr. MANN. It does not affect a case where the Government is a party defendant.

Mr. STERLING. It does not affect any case where the Government is a party. If the railroad should file the bill, it would not come within this exception.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The common people who are forced to go to law have a right to have litigation determined as rapidly as possible, have they not?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not this a circumlocution bill?

Mr. STERLING. I think this bill would delay the court very seriously, and I will just say a word about that. Of course, the main purpose of the bill is to apply to chancery courts with reference to injunction suits. The advocates of the bill, if there are any outside of the House, care nothing about contempts in law courts. It is contempts in injunction cases or contempts that arise in cases of equity. Now, courts of equity have no jury. Our law and the English law provided for no jury. They have no means of getting a jury. Suppose they should resort to a jury to determine a question of contempt. They devise a plan to get a jury and try the case. The jury may disagree, and then it would go over to another term of court or be very greatly delayed. Or suppose the court should set aside the verdict of the jury and it goes on and on with all those interminable delays of court procedure. All of this time the question of whether or not the court's decree has been violated is held in abeyance, and it would absolutely destroy the effect of the injunction and the orders of the court. Those rights, to protect which the injunction had issued, may be lost forever.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What becomes of the poor man forced to go to law who has to pay the lawyers' fees and wait all of that time?

Mr. STERLING. As a matter of fact, the bill could be taken advantage of by the man who has means, the man who could employ able lawyers to mislead juries, and work delays in the court. That is the man who would really obtain advantage by the bill and at the expense of another. The President referred to that in his letter of acceptance four years ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] referred to the grinding corporations which would crush down the poor workingman without this bill. I want to ask the gentleman whether the poor workingman would not suffer more at the hands of the grinding corporations in the event this bill should become the law?

Mr. STERLING. In my judgment, he would. This legislation might be made an engine for the destruction of human rights.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman one more question. On the fourth page of the bill it is specifically provided that if a conviction follows any action under this bill, then a fine shall be imposed not to exceed $1,000. Suppose the president of the Standard Oil Co. were to violate the provisions of this bill in an action brought against him by a workingman, a member of a labor union. Would that $1,000 limitation fixed by this bill be a punishment sufficient to meet the crime?

Mr. STERLING. The substitute bill which I have offered has the same provision in it. Personally I wish it were not there. I do not believe there ought to be any limitation of punishment for contempt except the wise discretion of the court, which, under the substitute bill, would be subject to review.

Mr. UTTER. Of course this law or any criminal law will not affect a man who intends to be honest. Can the gentleman tell us what advantage this law will give to the man who wants to do an improper thing, if he wants, perhaps, to do a criminal act?

Mr. STERLING. In case he wants to do an improper thing or a criminal act in the violation of the court's order, it will give him the right of trial by jury.

Mr. HARRIS. Might not there be a sad result following from this bill in case of an order, for instance, restraining from interfering with workmen in the case of a strike where there was some violation of the order going to the extent of a crime by some but not an actual assault by others, so some would have the right of trial by jury and others would be punished under the ordinary contempt process?

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman's question illustrates the inconsistency of the bill. Suppose some workman should undertake to interfere with other workmen in the performance of their employment. The man who interferes in violation of a restraining order and commits an assault in so doing is entitled to a trial by jury, while the man who interferes and violates the order of the court by other than criminal means is not entitled to a trial by jury.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I understood from the gentleman's reply to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that he considers that this bill will give corporations greater power to grind employees than now exists. Now will the gentleman point out the provision in the bill that gives that additional power to corporations?

Mr. STERLING. Well, I will only state to you what I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania meant, and that is that the corporation which violates an injunction and commits a crime in so doing, would be more likely to escape than the poor man, because it can hire able counsel to appear before the jury and defend it. I think that is what he meant.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very glad that the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] put that question. As I read this bill—and I want the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] to answer, if he will—it means in a contest between a poor man and a rich man, the game being to play the witnesses as long as possible and to resort to every legal procedure known to skillful lawyers, that under the provisions of this bill the poor man will go down.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that the court has a larger control under this provision?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think not. Under this bill the contumacious rich man will play the case along by demanding every right the bill affords him.

Mr. CLAYTON. What would be the rights?

Mr. STERLING. Permit me to read the plank in the Republican platform adopted within a few weeks at Chicago to see how it comports with your idea of proper legislation and proper respect for the dignity and the power of the American courts. It says:

> The Republican Party reaffirms its intention to uphold at all times the authority and integrity of the courts, both State and Federal, and it will ever insist that their power to enforce their processes and to protect life, liberty, and property shall be preserved inviolate.

How do you like that doctrine, gentlemen? That is a declaration against legislation of this kind. You will find nowhere in the Republican platform any fake promises of sham legislation. That plank sounds good to me. It has the ring of genuineness and sincerity. I want the country to understand if possible—and I hope that every man in this broad land will know where the Republican Party stands in its attitude toward American courts. It says it is opposed to taking away from these courts any of the judicial powers which the Constitution placed with them.

Now, further, the Democrats have a plank in their platform that sounds wonderfully good, too. I want to call their attention to that:

> The courts of justice are the bulwarks of our liberties, and we yield to no one in our purpose to maintain their dignity. Our party has given to the bench a long line of distinguished justices who have added to the respect and confidence in which this department must be jealously maintained.

That is true. The last statement is absolutely true. There have been just as able and just as righteous men from the Democratic Party on the bench as from any other party, and I propose now to read to you utterances of one of those same distinguished justices on this very question, and it is the latest utterance of the Supreme Court on the question of contempt. This decision was rendered by Justice Lamar, a distinguished judge, furnished to the country by the Democratic Party, and the case is that of the Bucks Stove & Range Co. against Mr. Gompers and others:

> For while it is sparingly to be used, yet the power of courts to punish for contempts is a necessary and integral part of the independence of the judiciary, and is absolutely essential to the performance of the duties imposed on them by law. Without it they are mere boards of arbitration, whose judgments and decrees would be only advisory.
> If a party can make himself a judge of the validity of orders which have been issued, and by his own act of disobedience set them aside, then are the courts impotent, and what the Constitution now fittingly calls "judicial power of the United States" would be a mere mockery,

This power "has been uniformly held to be necessary to the protection of the court from insults and oppression while in the ordinary exercise of its duty, and to enable it to enforce its judgments and orders necessary to the due administration of law and the protection of the rights of citizens." (Bessette v. W. B. Conkey Co., 194 U. S., 333, 48 L. ed., 1004; 24 Sup. Ct. Rep., 665.)

There has been general recognition of the fact that the courts are clothed with this power, and must be authorized to exercise it without referring the issues of fact or law to another tribunal or to a jury in the same tribunal. For, if there was no such authority in the first instance, there would be no power to enforce its orders if they were disregarded in such independent investigation. Without authority to act promptly and independently the courts could not administer public justice or enforce the rights of private litigants. (Bessette v. W. B. Conkey Co., 194 U. S., 337, 48 L. ed., 1005; 24 Sup. Ct. Rep., 665.)

I am justified, gentlemen, after reading that decision in saying to you that these eminent and distinguished judges, furnished to the country by the Democratic Party, will proceed to tear down legislation of this kind just as fast as eminent and distinguished statesmen on the other side of this House build it up. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. And yet the court in that very case did reverse the judgment of the court below in finding a man guilty of contempt in that proceeding, and sent the case back for trial.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; what of it? That does not affect the doctrine laid down by Justice Lamar——

Mr. BARTLETT. No.

Mr. STERLING (continuing). And which is in strict harmony with a long line of decisions in this country and in England.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want my friend, the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. STERLING. The reason I referred to that case was to show to gentlemen on that side the true doctrine as it has been recognized by these distinguished Democratic jurists of whom they boast in their platform, and in whom I, too, feel a patriotic pride.

Mr. BARTLETT. And it is to prevent the repetition of what occurred the other day in the retrial of that case that I want to pass a bill like this.

Mr. STERLING. Then get up a bill to that effect. Do not offer this bill for any such purpose as that, because it does not reach that point at all.

Now, I want to read from a few more cases very briefly. I agree with gentlemen that they can produce cases on the other side which say that Congress has the right to regulate the administration of the power to punish for contempt, and I think you will find in every case to which they refer that Congress can curb the judicial power only when it goes beyond the point where it is necessary to enforce orders and decrees and to preserve the efficiency and the dignity of the court. But gentlemen will not find any cases, in my judgment, at least no well-considered case, that says the legislature of a State or the Congress of the United States can either take away from the courts the power to decide justiciable questions or take away from the courts the power to enforce their decisions in such cases. The views of the minority, signed by the six Republican members of the Committee on the Judiciary, cite a number of cases, some Federal and some State cases, to some of which I call special attention.

This is a decision rendered by Justice Brewer, and he discriminates between the legislative power and the judicial power of the Government. I think some gentlemen are likely to make the error of thinking that this is a Government of delegated powers, relating to the judiciary, but that is not true. It is a Government of delegated powers so far as Congress is concerned. Everything that is not specified in the Constitution was reserved by the States, so far as relates to the legislative power, but not so with the judicial power. The Constitution simply speaks of "the judicial power of the United States"—that means all of the judicial power. It does not designate certain powers that are given to the courts of the United States, but it confers "all judicial power." And by "all judicial power" is meant that power which was recognized in England and America as belonging essentially and inherently in the courts before the Constitution was adopted.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the courts of the United States had, at the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted, all the powers inherent in the courts of England? That is what the gentleman just said.

Mr. STERLING. I did not say it just that way, but I will repeat what I said.

Mr. COOPER. That is the substance of it.

Mr. STERLING. I say that all the judicial power of the United States was reposed by the Constitution in the Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress might establish, and that by "judicial powers" was meant such power as was recognized in England and America as necessary and inherent in the courts before the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. COOPER. Now will the gentleman permit me to read just three or four lines?

Mr. STERLING. No; I regret I can not.

Mr. COOPER. It is a question. I want to ask the gentleman to construe this language.

Mr. STERLING. If it is not lengthy I will yield.

Mr. COOPER. It is found in the case of Finck against O'Neil, in the Supreme Court of the United States, volume 106, page 280:

"For," as was said by Mr. Justice Daniel, in Cary v. Curtiss (3 How., 236, 245), "the courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law."

Is not that in exact contradiction of the gentleman's statement?

Mr. STERLING. Not at all.

Mr. COOPER. I mean his statement that the Federal courts have the powers inherent in the courts of England by common law?

Mr. STERLING. Not at all. If the gentleman will read that decision he will find that the court had reference purely to jurisdiction, and not to the judicial power. Up to the time of the adoption of the Constitution the courts of the United States were substantially the same in character and in constitution as the English courts. And, so far as the judicial power went, the Constitution meant it should remain the same and should rest in the courts, as before.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wanted to put in another case in support of the one cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. In Cary v. Curtiss (3 How., 236, 254) the same court said:

The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitutions, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law.

Mr. STERLING. This is a decision rendered by Justice Brewer. I want to read from the opinion in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 31):

In the Constitution are provisions in separate articles for the three great departments of Government—legislative, executive, and judicial. But there is this significant difference in the grants of powers to these departments: The first article, treating of legislative powers, does not make a general grant of legislative power. It reads:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress," etc.

On the other hand, in Article III, which treats of the judicial department—and this is important for our present consideration—we find that section 1 heads that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." By this is granted the entire judicial power of the Nation. Section 2, which provides that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States," etc., is not a limitation nor an enumeration. It is a definite declaration, a provision that the judicial power shall extend to—that is, shall include—the several matters particularly mentioned, leaving unrestricted the general grant of the entire judicial power. There may be, of course, limitations on that grant of power, but, if there are any, they must be expressed, for otherwise the general grant would vest in the courts all the judicial power which the new Nation was capable of exercising.

Then it says further:

Speaking generally, it may be observed that the judicial powers of a nation extend to all controversies justiciable in the nature, and the parties to which or the property involved in which may be reached by judicial process, and when the judicial power of the United States was vested in the Supreme and other courts, all the judicial power which the Nation was capable of exercising was vested in those tribunals; and unless there be some limitations expressed in the Constitution it must be held to embrace all controversies of a justiciable nature arising within the territorial limits of the Nation, no matter who may be the parties thereto.

Now, I do not know of any other definition of judicial power under the English law or under the American law except that laid down by Mr. Justice Brewer—that it is the power to decide justiciable questions submitted to it and to enforce its decrees. That is the power that was conferred by the Constitution on the courts, and that, I say, we have not the right to take away. We not only have not the right to take it away, but we have not the right so to curtail it as to destroy the effectiveness of the court in enforcing its decrees.

The Legislature of Virginia passed a law giving one charged with contempt the right of trial by jury, and in that case, known as the Carter case, in Ninety-sixth Virginia, the court says:

Being of opinion that the defendant was guilty of contempt, we shall not attempt any classification of it as a direct or indirect contempt. If it were a direct contempt, then its punishment was without doubt to be ascertained and fixed by the court without the intervention of a jury by the terms of the law.

It is incumbent upon us to consider whether it was within the power of the legislature to deprive the court of jurisdiction to punish it without the intervention of a jury.

In the courts created by the Constitution there is an inherent power of self-defense and self-preservation; that this power can be regulated, but can not be destroyed, or so far diminished as to be rendered ineffectual by legislative enactment; that it is a power necessarily resident in and to be exercised by the court itself, and that the vice of an act which seeks to deprive the court of this inherent power is not cured by providing for its exercise by a jury.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. STERLING. In just a moment. Let us not forget, gentlemen, that this legislation relates to a coordinate branch of this Government, and if we undertake to take from that coordinate branch any of the powers conferred on it by the Constitution, we are going beyond the limits of power prescribed to us by that same Constitution, and anything that tends in that direction is dangerous legislation, and will lead ultimately, if pursued, to anarchy in the United States.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman refers to a case that I argued in our Supreme Court and our court drew this distinction, that the court which in that particular case tried that party charged with contempt and inflicted punishment was the court mentioned in our Constitution, and therefore our court held that by virtue of the fact that it was mentioned in the Constitution, was a constitutional court, and had the power which could not be taken away from it, and that that situation does not apply to the inferior courts of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. I will concede that the gentleman's statement of facts is correct simply for the sake of the argument. Is not the district court of the United States a constitutional court?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No; not in the sense in which the Supreme Court in the decision referred to in the Virginia case understands it. It drew the distinction in that case of this character, that our court eo nomine was mentioned in our constitution, and that therefore it made it as compared with the Federal courts not mentioned in the Constitution a constitutional court. That distinction is made in the case the gentleman referred to.

Mr. STERLING. Let us see how tenable that distinction is.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the distinction drawn in that case; I do not contend that it is tenable.

Mr. STERLING. The Constitution of the United States says that the judicial power shall be vested in the Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as Congress may ordain and establish. We did not have any Supreme Court until Congress acted. Suppose Congress had not acted as to a Supreme Court; there could never have been any Supreme Court to which this power delegated by the Constitution could attach. It is the same with reference to the district courts and the circuit courts. It does not make any difference what you call them; Congress had to proceed to organize a Supreme Court just as well as inferior courts, which the Constitution says in the same terms and in just as plain language that Congress may establish and ordain as it did the Supreme Court.

It makes no difference whether it is the Supreme Court or the inferior court. When Congress acts this judicial power attaches, and we can not take it away. It must remain there so long as the court exists.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The argument that the gentleman makes as to the sufficiency is exactly the argument that I made, that there was no distinction, but the court overruled the contention and established the distinction between our inferior courts, and stated that because our court eo nomine was mentioned in the Constitution, that therefore it stood on a different basis when you come to legislate with reference to their power of contempt, and they overruled my contention and the contention the gentleman is making. I hold that it is perfectly sound myself.

Mr. STERLING. It is true that the Virginia court held that the legislation could not require a trial of a contempt case by a jury?

Mr. SAUNDERS. As the result of our Constitution.

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Because it was a constitutional court.

Mr. STERLING. Just as our district courts are constitutional courts.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not at all; they made that specific distinction.

Mr. MANN. But they were not deciding as to our courts.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I cited the Federal authorities allowing Congress to limit the Federal courts, but they held that that did not apply.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman from Virginia was one of the lawyers in that case, and I undertake to say that the gentleman did not agree as a lawyer with the holding of the court.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have just so stated. It only shows the refinement that courts will proceed to to sustain their authority.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman was exactly right in his contention; but I will go further and say that it makes no difference whether it is a constitutional court or not. Think of the very nature of the case. I know of no case where it is held that by reason of the fact that the court is not a constitutional court that it is bound to submit the trial of contempt cases to a jury. Think of the nature of the case! You establish a court and what does it mean? A tribunal that will exercise judicial power. What is judicial power? It is the power to decide cases and enforce the decision. That is all there is to it. If you take away either one of the elements of the power you have no court, you have simply a board of arbitration to pass on a proposition without the power to enforce it. That does not constitute a court.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Here is some language of the Supreme Court in that same case——

Mr. STERLING. Oh, I do not yield for that kind of an interruption.

Mr. COOPER. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman, after I have cited the language of the Supreme Court, how he can reconcile that language with his statement that where a United States court has entered a judgment it then and there has the inherent power to enforce it by execution or otherwise, and that Congress can not prevent such enforcement. That is what the gentleman just said. How does the gentleman reconcile that statement of his with this language of the Supreme Court in the case of Finck v. O'Neil (106 U. S., 280):

The United States can not enforce the collection of a debt from an unwilling debtor except by judicial process. They must bring a suit and obtain a judgment. To reap the fruits of that judgment they must cause an execution to issue. The courts have no inherent authority to take any one of these steps—

And that means power, of course.

Mr. STERLING. No; it means jurisdiction.

Mr. COOPER. As here used there is no difference at all.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, if the gentleman is not going to distinguish between jurisdiction and judicial power, I do not want to discuss the question with him at all.

Mr. COOPER. Let me finish the sentence—

The courts have no inherent authority to take any one of these steps, except as it may have been conferred by the legislative department; for they can exercise no jurisdiction—

Mr. STERLING. Yes; that case is cited here in the report of the majority.

Mr. COOPER. To continue—

For they can exercise no jurisdiction, except as the law confers and limits it.

The gentleman awhile ago gave one definition of the word "jurisdiction" as being the right to exercise authority within certain geographical limits, but, in my judgment, no man who wants to interpret language as it ought to be interpreted can understand that jurisdiction to issue an execution means anything else than authority to issue an execution.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman that I am perfectly familiar with the case that he has just cited. It is cited in the majority report, and it has not a single thing to do with the case that I was discussing nor a single thing to do with this bill. It is true that legislatures and Congress provide the means through which the courts may operate and exercise this judicial power. Executions and attachments are simply instruments provided for by legislation through which the court may exercise the power. Suppose the legislature said that a court could not issue an execution or an attachment or a warrant or anything of that kind. Then you have destroyed the court. The legislature has the power to destroy any court which it creates. It has only to repeal the act which created the court. If it does so, the court is destroyed. The legislature might also destroy a court by taking away its judicial power if the court would submit to it. But so long as Congress provides by law for a court and its organization, the Constitution will impart to that court the judicial power to decide and enforce its decisions within the jurisdiction prescribed by Congress. I hope I have made that plain to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I am inquiring whether he has considered the proposition that the same act may be punished as a crime and as a contempt at the present time. This bill provides that certain contempts must be tried by a jury if a crime has been committed in connection with them, which requires the ascertainment of the crime—in other words, practically a trial, in a contempt case, of the commission of the crime. Can the man then be tried for the crime?

Mr. STERLING. I would say certainly he could. The court has nothing to do with the punishment for the crime. It is only punishment for contempt with which the court deals in the contempt proceedings.

Mr. MANN. But under this bill the court is required to take that into consideration, because for the punishment of contempt you must first find that the man has committed a crime.

Mr. STERLING. I mean by that this: That the court has nothing to do with reference to trying the man for the crime. It is true under this bill the court must determine whether or not the man has committed a crime, but that is only for the purpose of determining whether the one charged with contempt shall have a trial by jury.

Mr. MANN. How can you find out whether the man has committed a crime without in some way trying him for the crime?

Mr. STERLING. You could not under this bill, but I did not prepare the bill, and I will have to leave the answer of that question to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to answer it now?

Mr. STERLING. Not now.

Mr. MANN. My question is whether or not, after you have determined that a man has committed a crime, you can then under the Constitution turn around and try him again for the same crime, after having found first the same offense in order to determine that it is a contempt.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think the fact that the court found first that he committed a crime would bar prosecution of the crime by indictment. That does not imply that the court could punish for the crime in the contempt proceedings. The court has nothing to do whatever with the punishment for crime. It is only the court's duty to impose such punishment as will enforce respect for and enforce obedience to its orders. That is why the court punishes for contempt.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield to one further question.

Mr. COOPER. It is true, I believe, that Congress by statute has adopted the exemption laws of the various States as far as enforcing judgment by execution is concerned. Now, is not that, in effect, the legislative department preventing under certain circumstances the United States district courts from enforcing their judgments, depriving them of the power possessed by common-law courts to enforce their judgments? For instance, we have said a homestead——

Mr. STERLING. Let me submit to the gentleman that does not go to the judicial power of the court.

Mr. COOPER. Why, it goes to the power of the court to enforce its judgment.

Mr. STERLING. It goes to the jurisdiction of the court. The legislature can prescribe the property over which the court shall have jurisdiction, but it does not go to the judicial power of the court. For example, in Illinois the legislature has provided exemptions against execution. One is entitled to a homestead of $1,000 and personal property to the amount of $400, exempt from execution. By doing so the legislature limited the property over which the court should have jurisdiction. It limited the jurisdiction, not the judicial power.

Mr. COOPER. Then the legislative department has the power by statute to prevent a court from enforcing its judgment, and the gentleman from Illinois said that the common-law courts of England had the inherent power to enforce their judgment by execution.

Mr. STERLING. And so have the American courts that power within their jurisdiction. And the gentleman from Wisconsin can not take it away.

Mr. COOPER. But the common law obtained in many of the different States, but the United States district courts have not inherent common-law power. Their power has been limited and regulated frequently by Federal statute ever since these courts were first organized.

Mr. STERLING. Exemption laws do not go to the judicial power of the court at all, but simply go to the question of property over which the court has jurisdiction. It would be more convincing if the gentleman would produce the case.

I want to read now from another decision. The supreme court of Michigan held as follows in Nichols v. Judge (130 Mich., 192):

> The question, therefore, is again presented to this court, Have the circuit courts of this State the inherent power to punish for contempts, or are they subject to the control of the legislature? The question is an important one in the administration of the law. If the legislature can determine what acts shall constitute contempts in the circuit courts, it can abolish the power of such courts to punish for the contempts. There is no middle ground; either the courts have the absolute control, under the constitution, over contempt proceedings, or they have only such as the legislature may see fit to confer.

Again, in the State of Ohio is another case in point. In Hale v. The State (55 Ohio State Repts.), the court say:

> In this case the inherent power to punish contempts and enforce orders of court by summary proceedings is fully sustained, and it is said of sections 6906 and 6907 of the Revised Statutes, which make certain acts formerly punishable as contempts now punishable by indictment as offenses against public justice, that if it is to be interpreted to take away from a constitutional court its inherent right to punish offenses of this character when they are contempts of court, the statute will be invalidated.

The State of Oklahoma passed a law providing for trial of contempt cases by jury, and the supreme court in that State used this language in Smith v. Speed (11 Okla., 95):

> If it now should be found that the judge had no power to enforce his order at all or to punish for contempt, and that the court had no power to punish beyond a fine of $50 and imprisonment not exceeding a longer period than 10 days in the county jail, and that a change of judge may be had and a change of venue from the county, and that a trial by jury may be had to determine whether the recalcitrant party is in contempt at all or not, it will be admitted by the bar, acquainted with the law's delays, that the power to punish for contempt, either direct or indirect, being destroyed in the judge, will be to a great extent destroyed also in the court and rendered valueless.
> If the contention now sought for by the plaintiff in error should be sustained, it would go to the extent that the court, in equitable proceedings, after a full hearing and a final determination and judgment upon the merits, is without the power to enforce its judgments by the imposition of a pecuniary penalty or imprisonment, and that in the endeavor to enforce its judgment by proceedings in contempt it would be subject to have its final judgment brought into review in the contempt proceedings upon a change of judge, or of venue, to a completely new jurisdiction and to a trial by jury, in which the merits of the final order, which has been made by the court, in the proceeding, should again be reviewed, including the question whether there was any merit, right, or authority of the court in the equitable proceedings in which the judgment had been rendered or the order made, and the equitable jurisdiction of the district court upon matters finally determined would thus be subject to be again brought in question by another judge in another venture and by a jury, a thing unheard of in the chancery jurisdiction. If such a state of things could be, it could but result in the degradation of courts and to make them truly the subjects of contempt.

It seems to me that there is great wisdom in that language, and that the judge who wrote it had studied and considered the extent to which a law of this kind might lead the country and the people. Now, gentlemen, I shall not take time to further read from decisions; there are many of them all holding the same thing. I think none of them hold to the contrary.

I do want to call attention to the bill which I offer as a substitute for this. The essential difference between the two is this, that the one provides for the trial of contempt cases by jury and the other provides that where the defendant in a contempt case feels that he can not get justice at the hands of the particular judge who issued the order or made the decree he may make application to have some other judge designated to hear the contempt. It does not provide for a trial by jury, it does not provide for a change of venue, it does not provide for a change of tribunal or a change of court, but it simply provides that if a defendant makes affidavit that he can not get a fair trial, then that judge shall call some other judge into that same court to hear and determine the contempt.

Some objection has been raised to our present practice in contempt cases. It has been said that a judge who issues an order or renders a decree ought not to be the judge who decides whether or not the order or the decree has been violated. They give as a reason that the judge might be prejudiced; that he might be partial to the enforcement of his own order or decree.

It is the only criticism that any man, so far as I know, or any litigant anywhere in the United States, has ever raised against the trial of a contempt by the judge who renders the decree that has been violated. He, having rendered the decree or the judgment, might be partial to the enforcement of it and might be led to do injustice to the defendant who is charged with the violation of it. This bill meets that criticism; whether justified or not, it is unfortunate that it exists, and this will dispose of it and allow the defendant to have another judge called in to try the case.

I desire to read what the President said on this question, so as to get it into the RECORD. In his letter of acceptance four years ago he discussed the Democratic platform, which is the same as the platform of this year, relating to contempt and injunctions.

He says:

DANGEROUS ATTACK ON POWER OF COURTS.

> This provision in the [Democratic] platform of 1896 was regarded then as a most dangerous attack upon the power of the courts to enforce their orders and decrees, and it was one of the chief reasons for the defeat of the Democratic Party in that contest, as it ought to have been. The extended operation of such a provision to weaken the power of the courts in the enforcement of their lawful orders can hardly be overstated.

EFFECT OF JURY TRIAL.

> Under such a provision a recalcitrant witness who refuses to obey a subpœna may insist on a jury trial before the court can determine that he received the subpœna. A citizen summoned as a juror and refusing to obey the writ, when brought into court must be tried by another jury to determine whether he got the summons. Such a provision applies not alone to injunctions, but to every order which the court issues against persons. A suit may be tried in the court of first instance and carried to the court of appeals and thence to the Supreme Court, and a judgment and decree entered and an order issued, and then if the decree involves the defendants' doing anything or not doing anything, and he disobeys it, the plaintiff, who has pursued his remedies in lawful course for years, must, to secure his rights, undergo the uncertainties and delays of a jury trial before he can enjoy that which is his right by the decision of the highest court of the land. I say without hesitation that such a change would greatly impair the indispensable power and authority of the courts. In securing to the public the benefits of the new statutes enacted in the present administration the ultimate instrumentality to be resorted to is the courts of the United States. If now their authority is to be weakened in a manner never known in the history of the jurisprudence of England or America, except in the constitution of Oklahoma, how can we expect that such statutes will have efficient enforcement? Those who advocate this intervention of a jury in such cases seem to suppose that this change in some way will inure only to the benefit of the poor workingman. As a matter of fact, the person who will secure chief advantage from it is the wealthy and unscrupulous defendant, able to employ astute and cunning counsel and anxious to avoid justice.

I have been willing, in order to avoid a popular but unfounded impression that a judge, in punishing for contempt of his own order, may be affected by personal feeling, to approve a law which should enable the contemnor upon his application to have another judge sit to hear the charge of contempt, but this, with so many judges as there are available in the Federal courts would not constitute a delay in the enforcement of the process. The character and efficiency of the trial would be the same. It is the nature and the delay of a jury trial in such cases that those who would wish to defy the order of the court would rely upon as a reason for doing so.

MAINTENANCE OF FULL POWER OF COURTS NECESSARY TO AVOID ANARCHY.

The administration of justice lies at the foundation of government. The maintenance of the authority of the courts is essential unless we are prepared to embrace anarchy. Never in the history of the country has there been such an insidious attack upon the judicial system as the proposal to interject a jury trial between all orders of the court made after full hearing and the enforcement of such orders.

It seems to me, gentlemen, that the President of the United States uttered the true and sane doctrine in that letter. I say to you we ought to hesitate before we set aside the advice laid down by that great jurist. He believes that such legislation as this, that would deprive the courts of part of their judicial power, might lead to anarchy in the United States.

What good can come from this legislation? What evils will be remedied and what rights will be more secure? If you can point to nothing it will accomplish in the way of enlightened progress then this bill should be defeated. If our present system of punishing contempts has worked well is it the part of wisdom for Congress, even if it has the power, to change it? Is it wise public policy to do so?

In this day of carping critics we hear much of criticism of our American institutions and especially of our courts. Criticism of some of the courts may be just, but that does not justify a radical change in the method of procedure that will hinder and embarrass our whole judiciary in the administration of justice. If in some instances, yet none have been cited, the judges have abused the power to punish for contempt, is it a wise policy to take from or seriously impair the power of all the judges to administer justice and maintain the dignity and authority of the courts of the land?

It has been urged that this legislation is needed to relieve the courts of the criticism that the judges are biased in their decisions as to whether their own orders have been violated and their authority defied.

They say that whether this criticism be just or not, they should be removed from the possibility of this charge. Even if this amounts to an argument it is not necessary to impair the power of the courts in the performance of their judicial functions to reach that end. If one accused of contempt feels that he can not have a fair trial before the judge "whose authority he has defied," it is not necessary to resort to the slow, uncertain, and cumbersome plan provided by this bill to remedy that evil, if it were possible under the Constitution to do so. The possibility of prejudice on the part of the judge may be eliminated by another plan much surer and more expeditious than this, and a plan that does no violence to the Constitution. Let the accused have the right to have another judge designated to try and determine whether he is guilty of the charge. A judge is qualified to know and understand the force and purpose of a decree and the importance to the litigants and to the people, of having it duly observed. This would avoid all the uncertainties and delays incident to the jury system. It would wholly remove the possibility of the accused being the victim of bias or prejudice and fully answers the charge that judges should be protected from the criticism that prejudice influences their decisions in such cases.

Mr. Speaker, I have offered a substitute for the pending bill. This substitute will answer all criticism, just or unjust, of the present practice, and at the same time leave inviolate the prerogatives of that other and coordinate branch of the Government which has shed glory on the founders of American institutions.

The fundamental distinction between the bill and the substitute is that the former provides a trial by jury in cases where the acts constituting the contempt also constitute a criminal offense, while the substitute provides that in indirect contempts the accused may have another judge to try the contempt.

We believe that it meets every criticism and avoids every evil that may be charged against the present practice.

It divides contempts into two classes, direct and indirect, and gives to each class the usual and natural definition.

It defines direct contempts as those committed in the presence of the court or of a judge at chambers. Under it these contempts shall be punished summarily by the court. No one would change the practice in that regard, and neither of the bills would deprive the court of the power to deal with such contempts in that way. It further provides that the judgment in such case shall be entered of record and that the judgment shall contain a statement of the acts and a statement, if any, of the accused, relied on as a defense or as an extenuation of the offense.

It provides a specific plan of procedure in all cases which charge an indirect contempt of court. The accused may in such case, upon his own affidavit that the judge is prejudiced against him and that on account thereof he believes that he can not have a fair trial, have another judge designated to hear and determine his case.

The bill also provides for a review by the higher courts on appeal or by writ of error.

We repeat that the only charge made against the present practice is that judges who have issued orders or rendered judgments and decrees should not be permitted to pass upon the question as to whether a person has violated such order or decree or has defied or assailed the authority of the court over which that judge presides. It is said that a judge under such circumstances is prone to bias and that his decision might be tainted with prejudice against the accused. This bill eliminates such a possibility, and it does it more effectually than does the bill reported by the majority. Under that bill the judge conducts the trial of the case before the jury, he passes upon the admissibility of the evidence, and delivers the charge to the jury, so that under the system provided by that bill there is still a possibility of the same criticism against him as in the present practice. The accused might still feel that he was the victim of judicial bias.

Such is not the case in the bill offered by the minority. Under its provisions the judge whose decree has been violated or whose authority has been defied is eliminated from the case, and it is submitted to another judge who could have no possible prejudice against the accused, because he has no connection with the case. This bill meets all objection to the present practice without doing violence to the long-established principles of equity which forbid the intervention of a jury in equity proceedings. It accomplishes the desired end without taking away or impairing the judicial power of the court conferred upon it by the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, this bill offered by the majority is a serious step in the wrong direction. It is an attempt on the part of one branch of the Government to invade the constitutional powers of another branch. As the legislative branch of a great Government we ought to guard with jealous care those prerogatives conferred upon us by the Constitution; we should watch with equal zeal that we do not impair the powers and the usefulness of the other coordinate branches. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STERLING. I would like to know how much time I have consumed, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed 1 hour and 48 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I ask the Speaker how much time has been consumed on this side and how much has been consumed by the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There have been 50 minutes consumed on the gentleman's side and 1 hour and 48 minutes on the side of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. CLAYTON. How much time is there remaining to the gentleman on the opposite side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There would be 42 minutes remaining.

Mr. CLAYTON. And I have how much time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hour and 40 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Thank you.

Now, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, with all deference to the learning and acumen of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois who has just spoken in opposition to the bill, I shall undertake in the few minutes which are allotted to me to show that he has utterly misconstrued the first provision of the act in question.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has stated that if a witness were subpœnaed to appear in court and he simply failed to appear, then under the provisions of this act he could be tried for contempt without a trial by jury; but if he should assault the marshal who served the process upon him he would be entitled to a trial by jury. A close analysis and reading of section 268a shows that this bill provides for nothing of the kind. It says:

SEC. 268a. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such a character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

Now, if a subpœna is served upon any witness or intended witness, the only thing that therein or thereby is commanded is his appearance in court. If he assaults the marshal he does not in any way violate the commands of the subpœna.

He is, of course, subject to contempt of court under general rules, and may be punished therefor without having the provisions of this bill apply to him in any way whatever, but the rule would be just the same if some other person assaulted the marshal instead of the person on whom the subpœna was served. In either case this proposed statute has no application whatever, because there is nothing in the subpœna with reference to his doing any act against the marshal or resisting the process of the court. In fact, that is wholly unnecessary, for any resistance to any process of the court would constitute a contempt.

Mr. STERLING. Does not the gentleman think the assault on the officer serving the subpœna would be resisting the process of the court?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly; it would be contempt of court to assault the officer while he was engaged in serving its process.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] did not rise and address the Chair.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But as it was not forbidden or referred to in the subpœna, it is not covered by the provisions of this act, and he would be tried by a summary proceeding for the assault. This, as I stated, can be easily seen from the fact that if he eventually came into court in response to the service of the subpœna, he could say that he had obeyed in every particular the order of the court, notwithstanding the fact that he had assaulted the marshal; and if he was to be tried for contempt in relation to the assault upon the marshal he would have to be tried on another charge—not for disobeying any order of court, but because he had obstructed its process by assaulting an officer engaged in serving its writ.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has intimated that the act might interfere with the court in its process in getting witnesses before it. Actually it would have no application of that kind whatever. If a witness refused to answer and obey a subpœna, the court could issue a bench warrant and bring the party before it instanter, and he would not be tried under the provisions of this act because such a case is expressly excluded. No criminal act would be done in simply violating the subpœna, and therefore it would not come under the provisions of this statute.

This act is intended to strike at the abuse which is created by endeavoring to punish criminal acts through the courts of equity, without the intervention of trial by jury. It is now too late, of course, to question the authority of courts of equity to issue writs which may forbid the commission of a crime, but I wish to say in this connection that criminal acts are practically the only kind or class which are reached by this statute; that is, the only cases included are where the injunction itself or the order of the court forbids some act which constitutes a crime.

Such being the case, I am in favor of this bill, because I believe in criminal cases being tried by courts which are constituted for the purpose; where the parties charged with having committed some criminal act are tried in the regular and ordinary way instead of being brought before a judge whose orders they are accused of violating. I have the greatest respect for the bench and know that every judge worthy of the name endeavors to act impartially and without bias or prejudice, but judges are human and share in human frailties. It would be only natural when a judge is required to try a case involving an alleged violation of his own orders that his inclination would be, and his rulings tend, in the direction of upholding what he deems the dignity and rightful power of his court. For this reason he might in some instances unwittingly fail to assume and preserve that absolute impartiality which ought to prevail in all court proceedings.

There is, however, an even more important reason for the passage of this bill. Ordinarily the highest and most serious crimes—even murder itself—are tried before a jury. This right and privilege of being so tried is deemed one of the most sacred guaranteed by our Constitution. No reason has been given, and none can be given why this right of trial should be given in one case and not in another. Some intimations have been made that parties violating the orders of the court and so tried might escape punishment if tried by a jury, but this is an attack on the whole jury system, and, if the argument be valid, then juries ought to be abolished entirely and even criminal cases tried through the court alone. If there should be found anyone who was willing to advocate such a proposition, it is hardly to be believed that he would sanction a trial before a judge who was at least indirectly interested in the result. It is urged that delay would be caused by these jury trials and thus the rich be enabled to take advantage of the poor. Those who make this argument forget that the trials referred to in this statute have nothing whatever to do with the parties who are litigating the main case, and that the judgment which has, or may be, rendered therein is not in any way affected thereby. The case does not wait for the proceeding provided for in this bill, nor will it be affected thereby. No one has undertaken to furnish a reason why a wealthy person could take advantage of a poor man under this statute, and, from a long experience on the bench, I say without hesitancy, that such an opportunity could not arise.

It is said also that there is no way of determining whether the alleged contempt is of such a character as to constitute a crime. This difficulty is entirely imaginary. Contempts not committed in the presence of the court must necessarily be brought before the court by some written charge. If the person accused of contempt claims to be entitled to a trial by jury under this act—should it become a law—then the court, from an examination of the charges, will determine whether the act described is of such a character as to constitute a criminal offense.

Mr. Speaker, it has well been said by a great lawyer that the great and special advantage afforded by a jury was that on the trial of matters before it it was able to mitigate the strict letter of the law and apply it according to the circumstances of the case in a manner in which a judge would not feel that he could act, even though he so desired. Thus, no matter by what vituperative or vicious language some scoundrel may give an unprovoked insult, if it is resented by a blow, a judge must say that an assault has been committed, but a jury, as a rule, leaves the offending party to his just deserts if that is what he has received. Scarcely a case arises in which the jury is not influenced by circumstances which the judge can not take into consideration. Sometimes it may be that this influence is wrongfully exerted, and I am inclined to think that our procedure ought to be so reformed as to prevent the pettifogger and the shyster from influencing juries by improper means, and that in our State courts the judges should have such powers that they might correct in the minds of the jurors by appropriate instructions any abuse of the privilege of a counsel when such abuse occurs. But all this pertains merely to whether reforms are needed in our jury system and not to whether a citizen accused of a crime ought to be denied the right to have a trial before a jury simply because the crime of which he is accused also involves an alleged violation of an order of the court. If it should be found that any persons who had thus violated the order were indeed escaping just punishment, then the reforms of which I have spoken will the quicker be brought forward, and in my judgment the consequences of such a failure, if there was any, would be less serious than the deprivation of a citizen's most important right.

It is said by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] that this act practically takes away the power of the courts to punish for contempt. It seems to me it does nothing of the kind. It simply prescribes the procedure that shall be used in cases of contempt, and the gentleman himself has furnished a sufficient answer when he says that the Congress has no power to regulate the procedure of courts in cases of this kind by the substitute which he has introduced to change the procedure and provide that a change of venue may be taken—something that never before has been granted in any case of this kind, and a proceeding that is utterly unknown at common law in cases of this class.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman ought to quote me fairly. I said it did not provide for a change of venue, and it does not provide for a change of venue. It simply provides for another judge to come into the same court. It does not change the venue at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It makes no difference, so far as the application of the argument goes. It changes the procedure in the case. The very introduction of the substitute implies a claim of the power of Congress to change the procedure—something that the gentleman has denied and insisted could not be done.

I have no time to review the decisions which have been recited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], but the Oklahoma case, upon which he lays especial stress, is not, in my judgment, entitled to any credit before a body of lawyers. Judging from the extract which the gentleman from Illinois read, that court seems to have thought that if a change of venue was granted in contempt cases and a trial had before another judge the whole merits could be determined upon such trial, and which, in effect, is the statement contained in the opinion. A court that was not aware that in such a proceeding the only thing which could be heard and determined would be the question of whether or not the order had been violated is not entitled to any consideration before this or any other body.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will pass. Instead of enabling the rich to take advantage of the poor, as charged, instead of being a "gold brick" for the workingman, as claimed, it will prevent wealthy corporations from making criminal accusations through a court of equity against laborers and having the accused summarily tried without the intervention of a jury. In the prevailing conditions of our jury practice I recognize there may be some cases tried under this statute if it becomes a law in which justice may not be effected, but there will be no more than in any other class of jury cases. The bill will prevent many abuses, grant protection to the weak, and make all persons equal before the law, which should be the aim of our jurisprudence.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I have followed the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] with a great deal of interest; but he could not have been more unfortunate, than in his reference to the Virginia case of Carter against Commonwealth as an authority for the proposition that the district and circuit courts of the United States, are constitutional courts. I fully agree with him that the courts which are constitutional creations have an authority which can not be reached by legislative action. He seeks to bring the inferior courts of the United States within the operation of that principle. I admit that if this can be done, the present matter of argument between us is concluded.

What is the language of the Constitution of the United States relating to the inferior courts? In this connection I will read it for the purposes of comment.

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

When the case of Carter against the Commonwealth arose in Virginia, a new statute relating to contempts had just been enacted. That statute was practically the one Senator Hill fathered in the Senate of the United States. The authority of the Legislature of Virginia to legislate against the contempt powers of the inferior courts of Virginia rested upon the proposition that those courts, like the inferior courts of the United States, are not of constitutional creation.

The distinction that was drawn by our Supreme Court between the present circuit courts of Virginia, and the circuit courts of the United States in respect of their constitutional character rested upon the difference in the language used by the instruments relating to these respective courts. The Virginia court construed two constitutions. In the first, the following language is found which is in all material respects the language of the Constitution of the United States in Article III, section 1:

The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court of appeals, and in such superior courts as the legislature may from time to time ordain and establish.

I take it there is no lawyer on this floor who can draw any distinction in effect between that language, and the language of the organic law of the United States, upon which the gentleman from Illinois relies to show that the inferior Federal courts are of constitutional creation.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman submit to an inquiry?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman will remember that I took the position that the United States district courts were constitutional courts.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand that the gentleman took that position.

Mr. STERLING. If I am right on that point, the gentleman will concede that the Virginia case sustains my position, will he not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Without reference to the Virginia case I concede that if the courts referred to are constitutional courts, there is no issue between the gentleman and myself; but I intend to satisfy my friend that the language of the Constitution of the United States heretofore cited was in substance construed by the Supreme Court of Virginia, and the conclusion reached was that the subordinate Federal courts are not constitutional courts.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman will also agree that anything the court may have said about the district courts of the United States in that decision would be pure obiter dicta.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly, but the gentleman cited a case from my State as authority, and I am going to hoist the gentleman with his own petard. The Virginia court decided precisely the contrary proposition from the one advanced by the gentleman from Illinois, that the language used by the Federal Constitution makes the courts to which it refers, constitutional creations.

Mr. CLAYTON. In other words, the gentleman from Illinois quoted the Virginia case as an authority to sustain his contention.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly. Now, as I have said, the language of the constitution of Virginia that was first construed by the Supreme Court, in the Carter case reads as follows:

The judicial power—

shall be vested in a supreme court of appeals and in such superior courts as the legislature may from time to time ordain and establish.

I renew the assertion that the gentleman from Illinois can draw no distinction between the effect of that language, and the language found in the Federal Constitution. What did the Supreme Court hold when it came to interpret that language? It held in terms that the constitution of Virginia then under consideration did not create these subordinate courts, nor clothe them with jurisdiction, but that the courts were established by the legislature; in other words that court when interpreting language to all effects the same as the language of Article III, section 1 of the Constitution of the United States, concluded that the courts created by that constitution were not constitutional courts, but were legislative courts and therefore subject to legislative authority.

A step further.

The second constitution of Virginia construed in the Carter case contained the following language relating to the courts:

There shall be a supreme court of appeals, district courts, and circuit courts.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that in the forum of reason, there is no distinction in effect between that language, and the language, of the prior constitution. Before the supreme court I argued that something more was necessary to make a court a constitutional creation, than the mere mention of its title in the organic act—that this act should afford the court some jurisdiction, and thereby raise it to the dignity of a constitutional court superior to legislative control in the exercise of that jurisdiction. But the court did not agree to that view. Passing on the language that "there shall be a supreme court of appeals, district courts and circuit courts," the court held that the courts referred to, do not derive their existence from the legislature—"that they are called into being by the constitution itself, by the same authority which creates the legislature, and the whole framework of the State government."

So that while the Carter case held that the Legislature of Virginia did not possess the power to control the exercise of the power to punish for contempts by the inferior courts of that State, that conclusion was based upon the fact that the "circuit court" was mentioned eo nomine in the then constitution, and was therefore a constitutional court. Under the antecedent constitution the circuit courts of Virginia were related to the constitution of Virginia, precisely as the circuit courts of the United States are related to the Constitution of the Federal Government. Can anything be plainer, or more manifest than that?

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman did not think that the court was right?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, I did not, in its last conclusion.

Mr. STERLING. And the gentleman does not now think that the court was right?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, I do not.

Mr. STERLING. Well, I would rather have the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] than the decision of the court.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I thank the gentleman for the compliment, but I call his attention to the fact that it was the ruling of the court on the language of the second constitution, and not on that of the first, that was in my judgment erroneous.

Mr. COOPER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I wished to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, but I will now ask it of the gentleman from Virginia. Does the gentleman think that so worthy a gentleman as the gentleman from Illinois, who is so earnest in his defense of the courts and the sanctity of the judicial ermine, should presume to say to the gentleman from Virginia that he thought more of his opinion than of the opinion of the court of appellate jurisdiction?

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman from Wisconsin ought to have asked me that question and I would have answered it.

Mr. COOPER. But the gentleman sat down too quick.

Mr. STERLING. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow, I will answer it. The opinion expressed by the gentleman from Virginia is supported by practically all the courts in the United States, State and Federal, and therefore I think it is worth more on that particular point than the decision of the court of Virginia, which was purely obiter dictum. Perhaps if it had been presented directly to the court the decision of the court might have been different.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Permit me to go a step further. Having seen that the Supreme Court of Virginia held that courts mentioned eo nomine in the organic act are constitutional courts, and courts established under legislative act pursuant to authority given by such language as is found in the Federal Constitution, are legislative courts, we will now inquire into the rulings of the Federal courts, on the latter proposition. Looking to these authorities, it is manifest that they are clearly against the contention of the gentleman from Illinois that the subordinate courts of the United States possess inherent powers of contempt beyond the reach of the Congress of the United States.

Before I cite a case of two, let me say to my friend that he has cited some State authorities which refer to the common law. State decisions are often based on precedents of the common law which is no part of the Federal system. Such decisions are not helpful in the determination of the proposition in issue.

If I correctly understood another proposition of the gentleman he made the following statement relating to judicial power, that when jurisdiction is once given to the Federal courts they all possess the authority to enforce that jurisdiction, and that authority under the judicial power, can not be taken away by legislative act. In other words this power of enforcement is inherent and fundamental, and is derived from the organic law. I deny that proposition absolutely. Whenever the inherent powers of a court are mentioned in an English decision, whether a contempt or other power bear in mind that those courts did not have in contemplation any power which could not be reached by legislative authority. There is no court in Great Britain which possesses powers that are beyond the reach of the Parliament of that country.

Hence when you speak of the inherent authority of the courts, if you are citing an English decision, do not forget that this language does not mean in the contemplation of those decisions an authority that is superior to the power of legislative control.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman from Alabama yield me a few minutes more?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like very much to, but I warned the gentleman not to be interrupted, and my time is parceled out. I regret exceedingly that I can not do it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this is not to come out of my time.

Mr. STERLING. No; it will come out of my own time. I want to say to the gentleman that I yielded more time to the gentleman and to Members on his side of the House than I devoted to my own purpose. The gentleman from Virginia was courteous to me, and I will give him two minutes out of my time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. I will now refer to certain authorities in this connection. In Finck v. O'Neill (106 U. S., 272) the court said:

> The United States can not enforce the collection of a debt from an unwilling debtor, except by judicial process. They must bring a suit and obtain a judgment. To reap the fruit of that judgment they must cause an execution to issue. The courts have no inherent authority to take any one of these steps, except as it may have been conferred by the legislative department; for they can exercise no jurisdiction except as the law confers and limits it.

This is a decision of a Federal court, and is full authority for the proposition that the subordinate Federal courts do not possess a paramount inherent power to enforce jurisdiction, but that the power which they exercise is derived from the legislative department.

Again, in Cary v. Curtis (3 How., 236, 254), the court said:

> The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription, or by the common law.

A word further. I wish I had time to discuss these decisions a little more at length, because this question of legislative authority, is an interesting one. One more case, a basic one, will be cited. In ex parte Robinson, the Supreme Court used the following language:

> The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power, but the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 3, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and power from the Constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt; but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question.

These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending, or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is therefore to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases. This authority is beyond attack.

So that the supreme court of my own State, and the Supreme Court of the United States, concur in the proposition that when the organic law provides that the judicial power shall be vested in such courts, as the legislature shall ordain, and establish, these courts are not constitutional courts, but derive their jurisdiction and authority from the legislative grant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will occupy some of his time.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I think not now. The gentleman has not occupied nearly so much time as I have. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who desires to speak next upon this side is not here at the present time, and I can not use any time now. The gentleman ought not to ask it under the circumstances.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Alabama thinks that he ought to ask it. The gentleman has had several speeches more upon this side than has the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STERLING. But the gentleman has not occupied nearly as much time.

Mr. CLAYTON. And he asks the gentleman on that side to consume some of his time at this point. It is fair and right. We have just had a speech upon this side.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what is the status in respect to the time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama has 81 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Illinois has 40 minutes remaining.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I must decline to use it now. I can not say that I would not do so to accommodate the gentleman if the next speaker were here, but he is not in the Chamber, and I will have to decline to use the time now.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the cause of the gentleman is so lacking in advocates that he has no one to espouse it at this time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible in 10 minutes to take up the range of discussion on this bill that has been outlined here to-day. It would be very interesting to comment upon the line of argument that has been indulged in, to discuss the inherent powers and authority of courts with respect to contempts, whether created by Constitution, by prescription, or by statute. I shall confine what I am able to say in the few brief moments I have by referring to the courts that are created by the Congress of the United States, whose proceedings are affected by this bill. We gave these courts their being, we provide them with the machinery with which they operate, we define their jurisdiction, we give them their powers, we tell them what they may or may not do, and we may prescribe how they shall proceed. They have no inherent powers that they derive outside of their creator—the Congress of the United States. This question has been so repeatedly settled that it seems useless to take up the time of the House on an afternoon when the temperature of the Chamber seems to be in the neighborhood of 102.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, it is far from that; nobody looks cooler than the gentleman does.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I am between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], two apparently heated bodies. But to proceed—in the case of Cary against Curtis, in Forty-fourth United States, Third Howard, page 236, the court uses this language:

> The courts of the United States are limited in their nature and constitution and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law.

We have created the district courts of the United States. It is the intention of this law to prescribe the manner in which these courts shall proceed in ascertaining the guilt of a party charged with a contempt of the court. This is clearly within our rights under the Constitution. The only question that the Congress has to decide is whether or not this bill is sound public policy; whether or not it is in the furtherance of justice, in the promotion of the common welfare to provide that a man shall not be convicted and punished for a contempt committed out of the presence of the court, without a jury passing on the question of fact involving the guilt or innocence of the accused. I believe the provisions of the bill sound and that they provide for better procedure in contempt cases.

Mr. Speaker, we have already defined what the courts may do regarding a contempt. The act of 1831 limits the powers of United States courts in contempts to three classes of cases:

(1) Where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.

(2) Where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transaction.

(3) Where there has been disobedience or resistance by an officer, party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts. The law happily prescribes the punishment which the courts can impose for contempts. The seventeenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. L., 73) declares that the court shall have power to punish contempt of their authority in any cause or hearing before them by fine or imprisonment at their discretion. The enactment is a limitation upon the manner in which the power shall be exercised and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment.

I think no one will deny we could have gone further. We were not required to go as far as we did; it was merely a question of policy. It was a question of public policy that appealed to the wisdom of Congress when the act of 1831 was passed, which defined and limited the authority of the court with regard to contempts.

No one, I take it, who has had experience with contempt cases will deny the wisdom of proceeding in a more orderly way to ascertain the guilt or innocence of the accused when one is charged with having violated an order of the court alleging him guilty of a constructive contempt or misbehavior out of the presence of the court. A man has a right under the Constitution of the United States to ask that a question of fact affecting his guilt or innocence of an offense, subjecting him to fine or imprisonment, shall be ascertained by a jury. No one has ever questioned the wisdom of that provision of our fundamental law. It is urged that the courts of the United States, the creation of the Congress, shall be permitted to exercise this authority and ascertain the question of fact, and having ascertained that fact against the accused, may then proceed to impose a fine or imprisonment. And why this extraordinary power?

The answer is made by those who oppose this legislation that such a law as is proposed takes away from the court an inherent power. The courts have no such inherent powers. All the powers they have, I repeat, have been given to them by Congress, and the Congress therefore has the right in its wisdom to prescribe the cases in which an order may be made, the kind of writs that may be issued, the circumstances under which writs or orders may be issued—defining them. Then, having that right, it has the right to prescribe the manner in which a violation of any of the orders of the court may be ascertained. A man charged with an offense subjecting him to fine or imprisonment, whether by complaint or by indictment, is as inherently entitled under the Constitution of the United States to a trial by jury in one case as in the other. The courts have exercised a powerful discretion, not by inherent rights, not by authority of the Constitution or of statutes, but by growth of power exercised by the courts, until they have made some of their processes and the manner in which they have punished for violation of their orders open to criticism. I have never gone to a court at chambers and secured an order without notice against a party to an action that I did not feel that I was getting an advantage. Such a practice was never authorized by the statutes of the United States. It was a growth of exercise of power by the court or judge. It weakens the courts in the exercise of their rightful processes to issue orders without notice and to find those against whom such orders are issued guilty of violating them without the intervention of a jury and imposing punishment by fine or imprisonment. Such exercise of power is against sound public policy and has led to abuse. This law is to correct that abuse. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in order to answer the interrogations of a good many gentlemen, I desire to call attention to a statement I made in the beginning of this discussion which some gentlemen present did not hear. I said at that time:

> I am informed that to-morrow being Calendar Wednesday there will be no objection on that side to the taking of the vote on this bill the first thing on Thursday. If I am incorrect about that I would like the Chair to correct me, or if there is any dissent from it I would like to hear it now; that on Thursday next the first thing after the approval of the Journal and any little routine business we shall vote on the passage of this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] will offer his bill as a substitute for the main proposition, and if that is voted down, which I apprehend it will be largely by the votes of gentlemen on the opposite side of the aisle, then the main proposition will be in order, namely, the passage of this bill, and after the disposition of this contempt bill, then it is my purpose, and I understand it will be in order, for me to get up for further consideration the impeachment matter against Judge Archbald, and ask for the action of the House upon it at that time.

I desire to say to the membership present that it is not my purpose to ask for a vote on this bill, but in accordance with this public statement made to the House in the beginning of this discussion I expect the vote to be had on Thursday after the approval of the Journal. This was assented to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] will use a little of his time.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is not present, so I can not do it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am sorry that your whole cause depends upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. STERLING. There is no need to worry about that.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am not worrying. I am rather felicitating myself that the gentleman's cause is so weak. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

[Mr. FOWLER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] use some of his time.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] such time as he desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. As much as I may desire. Article III of the Constitution provides:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

It seems to be conceded by gentlemen who favor the bill that the judicial power vested by the Constitution in the Supreme Court of the United States can not be interfered with by Congress, but it is claimed that because Congress itself by law provides for the district courts of the United States and the courts of appeal therefore Congress has the authority to limit and control their judicial power. It seems to me that all of the courts are upon the same plane, whatever the control of Congress over them may be.

The Supreme Court of the United States, while expressly named in the Constitution, is not created by the Constitution. It is created by an act of Congress. Its membership in number has been changed from time to time by Congress, and it is no more mentioned in the Constitution than are the inferior courts which come within the terms of this provision of the Constitution.

There has been a clear distinction drawn between the constitutional courts of the United States and those which are not constitutional. The constitutional courts are those in which the judges under the Constitution are appointed for life or good behavior. No one denies that the district court judges and the circuit court judges are appointed for life or good behavior.

We have provided for those courts under this article in the Constitution. Those are constitutional courts as much as the Supreme Court.

On the other hand we have created district and Territorial courts, and provided for the tenure of office of the judges and fixed the term at four years. The question long ago arose whether those were constitutional courts, and it was held by the Supreme Court that the Territorial courts which are created by Congress, not under Article III of the Constitution concerning the judiciary, were not constitutional courts. Whether we have a different control over them I do not propose to argue, but by those who concede that the power of Congress over the Supreme Court is limited it must, it seems to me, be also conceded that the same limitation of power, if any exists, applies to the district and circuit courts created under Article III of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the provisions in the bill now before us are not very plain. The first section provides in effect that the law which would be made by its passage shall only apply to contempt cases which also constitute a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law. I asked a while ago how it would be determined in advance whether a criminal offense had been committed. There is an order issued by a court. It is violated. The violation of the order is an act of contempt. How will it be punished? If the acts done by the person who has violated the order constitute a criminal offense, then it must be punished under the terms of this act. If they do not constitute a criminal offense, then the contempt can not be punished under this act, but must be punished in accordance with the practice now in existence. Who can tell in advance whether a crime has been committed? Who undertakes to know in advance whether the contempt shall be punished by the judge, or by an order entered by him after a hearing before him, or by an order following a trial by jury?

But that is not all. How is the jurisdiction under this act invoked? Let us assume that an order has been violated. If the act is to be tried under this provision, then it must first be shown by the return of a proper officer on a lawful process that a crime has been committed, or it must be shown by an information filed by the district attorney that a crime has been committed in connection with the contempt, or it must be upon the affidavit of some credible person. Of course, the return of the officer ordinarily can not determine or state whether a crime has been committed. Nor will the district attorney ordinarily file an information. Some person in behalf of the complainant, if it is an order in behalf of a complainant against defendants, will file an affidavit before the judge alleging that a contempt has been committed. Suppose he asks for a punishment of the contempt under the existing practice and says nothing about a crime having been committed. The judge has the power to proceed and hear the case. Will it be necessary, under this act, for the person brought up for contempt, if he desires to avail himself of the provisions of this act, to prove that he has committed a crime? There is no other way of getting at it. The complainant represents to the court that the defendant, or some other person, has violated an order and hence is in contempt of court. He asks for a punishment of that contempt. If the person desires to avail himself of the privileges of this act, he must prove to the court first that he has committed a crime.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois, in whose judgment I have very great confidence, if the character of the contempt is not to be ascertained by the showing made to the court, as described in section 268 B:

That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting—

By the method suggested by the gentleman from Illinois—that there is reasonable ground to believe that such contempt—

What contempt? Contempt involving criminality—has been committed—

Then he is to issue his process, and so on.

Mr. MANN. But suppose nobody files that affidavit?

Mr. KENDALL. Suppose the man never is proceeded against in contempt?

Mr. MANN. I know, but you can proceed against a person for contempt under the present practice. How, then, can that person avail himself of his right to trial by jury?

Mr. KENDALL. Simply by demanding a trial by jury if he is proceeded against, if there is criminality involved in the contempt.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means, then, that if you ask the court to proceed under the existing practice, which seeks to punish simply by the court, that the person proceeded against shall avail himself of the privilege conferred by this act, by showing that he has been guilty of a crime.

Mr. KENDALL. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Take the case pointed out. Nobody files an affidavit. Under the provisions of this act the defendant will not file an affidavit. The complainant files an affidavit before the judge under the existing practice, not alleging that a crime has been committed, but alleging that a contempt has been committed, and asking for a rule to show cause why the contempt should not be punished. Now, you represent the man who is brought before the court and you want a trial by jury. How do you get it?

Mr. SULZER. By asking for it.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. You are not entitled to it unless you prove, first, that your man has committed a crime; because this bill expressly provides that if no crime has been committed, then the court shall try the contempt. No trial by jury is authorized. Now, in order to get the man off on contempt you have got to prove that he has committed a crime for which he has been indicted.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. As I construe this provision in the bill, it gives the respondent the right to a jury trial if he demands it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not examined the bill as carefully as I have.

Mr. SULZER. I have read it very carefully.

Mr. MANN. The bill expressly provides that the trial by jury, as stated by the gentleman from Alabama, is only authorized when the contempt is of such a character as to constitute also a criminal offense. If the contempt does not constitute a criminal offense, then no trial by jury is authorized. Now, a man is brought before the court for contempt. Under the existing provisions and the bill itself, while it does not undertake to govern these contempts, it expressly provides that all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced in the first section of the bill may be punished in conformity to the usages of law and equity now prevailing, and those are not tried by a jury.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would not the complainant be required to set out the facts in his complaint or affidavit upon which he would ask a ruling against the man charged with violating the order of the court?

Mr. MANN. He is required to set out certain facts. He is required to show that a man has committed a contempt, he is required to show that the man has violated the order, but he is not required to show that the man has entered into a conspiracy.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is he not required to set out the facts constituting the contempt? He could not set out conclusions of law, but he would set out those facts which constitute the contempt, and that would show whether it was criminal or not.

Mr. MANN. I have had practice enough with contempt cases to know that the facts will not disclose anything of the sort.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have been required to set out facts extensively in these cases, and if that is done, then the judge will determine whether it is criminal or not.

Mr. MANN. The judge determines whether the order has been violated, but he does not determine whether these facts constitute a crime, nor is the complainant or the complaining witness required to disclose that a crime has been committed. The only way the respondent under this bill can avail himself of the provisions of it, unless on the complaint the witness has disclosed that a crime has been committed, is for the respondent himself to prove that a crime has been committed, and when he proves that he is guilty of the crime for which he can be indicted that ousts the jurisdiction of the judge to try him without a jury, and no further proceedings can be had until the proper jurisdiction is conferred by filing the proper papers in accordance with the second section of the bill.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman contend that if the accused should assert to the court that what was charged against him amounted to the allegation of a crime, that he would not then be entitled to a trial by jury?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. That is not the establishment of his guilt. The fact that the crime is charged is not a confession of guilt.

Mr. MANN. Of course if the mere assertion of the lawyer in a case would oust the jurisdiction, there would be no other jurisdiction. I never understood yet that the claim made by somebody—lawyer or otherwise—in court would decide the jurisdiction when jurisdiction depends on facts. This bill clearly defines the difference between jurisdiction in the one case and the other. You are making a departure here.

The law provides for the power of courts for punishing contempt and you are seeking to provide that in certain cases, and in certain cases only, a trial by jury shall be granted, and you expressly provide that that trial shall not extend to any case that you do not explicitly provide for in this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Must not the jurisdiction be set out in the pleadings in this case as in others; must not the complainant show that the court has jurisdiction?

Mr. MANN. Certainly, if you file a complaint or an affidavit under this bill you have got to do it as I say, by filing the affidavit having the return of an officer, or having information filed by the court. But suppose you do not proceed under this bill, but in accordance with the present practice, as you may, and obtain punishment for contempt. How does the man get a chance to avail himself of the provisions of this bill?

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. In ordinary contempt cases now where the contempt is charged if the facts are not set out by some one sufficiently to show on the face whether a contempt has been committed or not—for instance, if John Jones——

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is no doubt about the proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. In the statement of these facts, would they not show of themselves whether a crime had been committed in connection with the contempt under this bill?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. FOWLER. I can not see why it would not.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It is quite unnecessary to charge a crime in charging a violation of an order of court, which amounts to contempt—entirely unnecessary. It would not be done one time in a thousand.

Mr. FOWLER. For instance, a lawyer is charged with having purloined papers which belong to the court. When the matter is brought before the court, the court would make an order for the return of the papers, would it not?

Mr. MANN. Under this bill the lawyer could not be punished except by trial by jury, the gentleman says?

Mr. FOWLER. Then the fact itself would reveal that the purloining of the papers would be criminal in itself, and for that reason he would have a right to trial by jury under this bill.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. You ask to have a lawyer return papers, stating that he has them. That is no sign of criminality. Every lawyer has papers in a case and is subject to an order to return them. He does not return them. There is no crime in refusing to return the papers; not the slightest. He does not return them, and you enter an order on him to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. Under this bill he could not be punished unless he proves that he has committed a crime. There is absolutely no escape from it. Vote for the bill if you want to. It is a pure political proposition to bunko people.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has consumed 19 minutes, so the gentleman has remaining 21 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. And how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty-eight minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois will want at least one more speech?

Mr. STERLING. If the gentleman from Alabama has more than one speech, I think he ought to have them made at this time and then close with one speech.

Mr. CLAYTON. We could have a hundred in support of this meritorious measure if I had the time.

I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], who will speak in behalf of the laboring man referred to by his colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the only criticism that I have to make of this bill is that it does not go far enough, and yet this bill ought to be considered not by itself alone, but in conjunction with the anti-injunction bill passed by this House some time ago. It is the natural complement of the anti-injunction bill in so far as it applies to cases arising in trades disputes. Under the anti-injunction bill equity courts are prohibited from issuing restraining orders or injunctions to prevent peaceable assembling, recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means to place their patronage where they please, or from personally persuading any person to work or to abstain from work, and so on. It follows that if this bill becomes a law, and I hope it will——

Mr. CLAYTON. It will if the Republican Senate will permit.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That the equity courts will still have the power in trades disputes to issue injunctions restraining unlawful assembling. An unlawful assembly is in itself of a criminal nature. The equity court would still have the power to issue injunctions restraining men from persuading others by unpeaceful means not to patronize somebody, which is of a criminal character itself, and so on throughout the different phases of the anti-injunction bill. So that the power to issue injunctions in labor disputes would still exist in those cases where it was alleged that criminal means were being used for the purpose of carrying on any trades dispute. This bill, then, acts as a complement to that bill, and provides that when contempt proceedings arise out of those injunctions and the allegation upon which the contempt proceeding is based sets forth acts that are of a criminal character in themselves, then the party alleged to have committed the criminal acts will have the protection of a trial by jury. My contention is that every citizen of the United States is entitled to that kind of protection. The wageworkers of this country are not asking for any special legislation at the hands of Congress. They are not asking for any immunity from the law that is not granted to others, but they are insisting that they shall have the same rights, the same privileges, and the same protection that is given to other men under the law. There is no other class of our citizens as to whom the writ of injunction is issued in the same manner and for the same purpose as it is against the wageworkers of the country. It is issued en bloc, enjoining men from all kinds of things, and out of these injunctions grow these contempt proceedings.

And when these contempt proceedings come up for consideration, as the practice is to-day, the judge who has issued the restraining order whose order is alleged to have been held in contempt is the man who sits in judgment upon the case and determines whether or not the party shall be held in contempt. Whenever any measure of this character is up for consideration in this House men who are learned in the law and are opposed to the measure invariably inject the assertion that the measure is unconstitutional, and yet there can be no question whatever that in other cases where labor was not particularly affected any more than any other part of our citizens the Congress has limited the jurisdiction of courts, and the courts themselves have sustained the limited jurisdiction. If the contention is made that the judicial power of the United States is conveyed to every court that is created by the Congress of the United States, then when you created the Court of Claims all of the judicial power of the United States would have been conveyed to that Court of Claims when you created it, unless the Congress had the power to limit the jurisdiction or the power of the court it had created. When we created the Commerce Court, unless Congress had the power to limit the power and jurisdiction of the court, all of the judicial power of the United States would have been conveyed to the Commerce Court when you created the Commerce Court, and yet each of those courts have their power limited, limited by the very act which created the courts themselves, and limited, in my judgment, in accordance with the Constitution itself. Article III, section 1, of the Constitution says:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

Section 2 says:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, etc.

In the same section, in paragraph 2, it says:

> In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exception and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Now, then, the only constitutional power that is completely vested in the Supreme Court or in the courts of the United States is found in the last paragraph in cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party. In those cases the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction.

In all other cases it has such appellate jurisdiction as Congress may give it, and if Congress fails to give it appellate jurisdiction then both the jurisdiction and power of the Supreme Court ends with cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party. Those are the only powers specifically and clearly granted to the Supreme Court by the Constitution, and all other powers exercised by it are either assumed or granted to it by law.

All courts inferior to the Supreme Court are created by Congress and their powers and jurisdiction defined by Congress.

For example, the Commerce Court has its jurisdiction confined to matters of Interstate Commerce, and neither its jurisdiction or power extends beyond that.

The Court of Claims has its power limited to claims against the United States, and neither its jurisdiction or power extend beyond questions of that character. It follows then, as an inevitable sequence, that Congress has the power to prescribe the methods with which United States courts shall proceed in cases of alleged contempt, with the possible exception of those cases in which ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party.

The proposed law is completely within the constitutional powers of Congress to enact.

It will extend the right of trial by jury to indirect contempt cases where the acts alleged to have been committed are of a criminal character, and removes the suspicion that bias on the part of some judge does injustice to innocent parties.

There is no contention by those in favor of this bill that judges as a rule are biased or unfair; on the other hand, no one will for a moment contend that all judges are absolutely perfect. If that were true, we would need no law. We could then leave the adjudication of all disputes to the perfect man—the judge. But judges, like other people, have their limitations and their imperfections. No man is big enough to contain the sum of human knowledge, and without the sum of that knowledge he can not be the embodiment of all human wisdom.

Hence, the necessity for legislation which will so regulate the exercise of judicial power as to protect the people generally in the exercise of their rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

This bill is a step in that direction.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this bill, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by my friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], relating to procedure in contempt cases, is a meritorious measure and commands my favorable support. As a lawyer, no one in this country has greater respect for the dignity, the integrity, and the judicial powers of our courts than myself. However, for many years I have been a firm believer in the necessity of altering the practice and a constant advocate of the expediency of making a definite change in the procedure regarding contempts of court.

Long ago, in the Fifty-fourth Congress, the then senior Senator from the State of New York, the honorable David B. Hill—and there was no better lawyer in this country than that distinguished Senator—after careful consideration and much deliberation introduced a bill in the Senate to divide contempts of court into two classes, namely, direct contempts and indirect contempts. At the request of Senator Hill I introduced at that time the same bill in this House.

Mr. CLAYTON. I may say to the gentleman that Senator Hill and Judge Parker—both eminent lawyers—prepared that bill in cooperation, so Judge Parker has informed me.

Mr. SULZER. Quite so. That is my understanding. That bill provided that direct contempts—that is, contempts committed in the presence of the court—should be punished summarily as at present, and that indirect contempts—that is, contempts not committed in the presence of the court—should be tried by jury. The bill was favorably reported to the Senate in that Congress, carefully considered, and passed without a dissenting vote. It was pigeonholed in the House. For years I did all I could to pass it through this branch of Congress, but never succeeded. I now refer to that record, which speaks for itself, and it is a high tribute to the wisdom and the sagacity of my friend, the late Senator Hill, one of the most eminent legislators and one of the most distinguished Democrats of his time.

It has long been my opinion that the law and the practice regarding contempts of court should be changed and a distinction made between a contempt committed in the presence of the court that disturbs or obstructs the administration of justice and a contempt of court committed beyond the presence of the court—perhaps a hundred miles away or more—that would have no effect, directly or indirectly, whatever upon the due administration of justice. To that end I have introduced and reintroduced the so-called Hill contempt bill in every Congress from that day practically to this, and I declare without fear of successful contradiction that there is not a lawyer of standing who is familiar with the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and the Constitution of the United States who will challenge its constitutionality. So much for that.

The bill now under consideration differs somewhat from the bill formerly introduced and advocated by Senator Hill and myself, but its ultimate effect is the same substantially.

I quote from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, presented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], as follows:

Most of the important provisions of the bill are contained in section 268b. Before action by the court, except in the cases excepted from the operation of the bill, there must be presented a formal charge showing reasonable ground; and before the party is put upon trial he must be afforded an opportunity to purge himself of any actual or technical contempt which he may have committed. He can not be arrested until he has opportunity to either purge himself or make answer and has refused to do either. If arrested, or in case the matter can not be disposed of on the return day, he may be required to give bail.

The trial is by the court (1) in case no jury be demanded by the accused, (2) if the contempt be in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, or (3) if the contempt be charged to be in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name or on behalf of the United States. In other cases the trial is to be by jury.

Section 268c provides for the preservation of bills of exception, for review upon writ of error, for stay of execution pending proceeding, for review, and for bail in case the accused shall have been sentenced to imprisonment.

Section 268d excepts from the operation of the act contempts in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, and contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, and provides that in the excepted cases, as well as in all other cases not specifically embraced within section 268a, the punishment shall be in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

Section 268e bars proceedings for contempt unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of, and preserves the right of criminal prosecution, notwithstanding any proceeding and punishment for the contempts covered by the bill. It also excepts from the provisions of the bill any proceedings for contempt pending at the time of its passage.

Thus it is seen that the bill applies and gives a jury trial, with the exception noted, in all proceedings for contempt wherein the acts alleged to have been committed constitute a criminal offense, either under any Federal statute or at common law. The trial where a jury is had is governed (sec. 268b), as near as is practicable, by the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

Before calling further attention to the provisions of the bill now reported it is appropriate to review some of the contentions of those who have opposed every form of legislation whatever on this subject.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

All the grounds of objection are reducible to two heads:

First. That any legislation whatever materially limiting or curtailing the power of the courts in the trial of contempts is unconstitutional.

Second. That any interference with the full and complete dominion or discretion of the judge in contempt cases tends to disorganization and a weakening of judicial efficiency.

Let us consider first the constitutional objections.

It is said that although the courts inferior to the Supreme Court owe their existence and jurisdiction to congressional action, yet a distinction should be made between the jurisdiction and judicial power, for instance, in the citation, trial, and punishment of a party charged with contempt of court.

The controversy goes back over 60 years. In 1831 Congress passed an act limiting the power of the courts subjectively; that is to say, it lopped off some of the jurisdiction which the court had assumed and exercised—a jurisdiction, or power, if the latter term be preferred, which Congress believed, and by its legislation asserted, was a usurpation. Never, until within a very recent period, was the authority of Congress to do that questioned, either by the courts or by any respectable authority. The particular circumstance or event, instigating the act of 1831, was the punishment by Judge Peck in Missouri, as for a contempt of court, of a party who had criticized one of his decisions in the columns of a newspaper.

The law before the act of 1831 read thus:

"The said courts shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths, and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority."

The act of 1831 consisted in the addition of a proviso, reading as follows:

"Provided, That such power to punish contempt shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said court in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said court."

The extensive scope of this amendatory statute has been generally overlooked. The Federal courts were assuming and exercising the unlimited and unchecked powers resorted to by common-law courts, of deciding for themselves not only the mode of procedure and degree and amount of punishment, but of selecting for themselves particular acts of alleged misconduct which should be placed in the category of contempts. Congress treated the term "power" as synonymous with "jurisdiction," circumscribed the field of jurisdiction, specified the acts which should constitute contempts, and said that such power or jurisdiction shall not extend beyond these specified acts.

It has been suggested that Congress might have refused to create the inferior courts, or even the Supreme Court, and have thus caused the failure of the Government.

But it is said that when Congress has acted and established a Federal court the common-law and equity powers of the courts immediately flow into these judicial receptacles out of the Constitution. It is only necessary to examine this new doctrine to know to what absurdities it would lead. The common-law courts of England, with the King's bench at their head, in addition to administering statutory law and the common law proper, exercised certain parliamentary powers. In the English system the legislative and judicial departments were, and are, entirely independent of each other. It is true that the courts were bound by acts of Parliament as construed by them, but outside the statutes their powers were as free from limitation as those of Parliament itself. They were the exponents and final arbiters of public policy for the Kingdom.

Though it is often said that the three departments of our Government are separate and independent, which is true in a sense that they must not invade each other's constitutional domain and thus destroy each other, yet it is also true that arbitrary unchecked power does not abide with either of them. As the Supreme Court has well expressed it in Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S. Rep., 369):

"When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power."

To concede that the courts might, even within the limits fixed in the act of 1831, exclusively decide when a contempt has been committed and the amount or degree of punishment, with no power in Congress to set a limit thereto, would be to concede to the courts the power to annul every act of Congress, to paralyze the executive arm, to confiscate all property, and destroy all liberty. Of course few, if any, believe that the courts would ever proceed to such extremes, but it is sufficient to say that, according to our interpretation, the framers of the Constitution took care to safeguard the people against the possibilities of all such calamitous tendencies.

Referring to this bill, and comparing its provisions with the proviso added in 1831, it is seen that the bill only changes the procedure in contempt cases, while, as before stated, that proviso limited the jurisdiction subjectively.

The opposition was represented before the committee by able counsel, and many authorities were cited, few of which, however, in our opinion had any direct bearing on the question from a constitutional point of view. In fact, the power of Congress, as exhibited in the act of 1831, was so generally and uniformly conceded that not a single case has been found which ever questioned or doubted it. A few cases which, though not directly bearing upon the point of constitutionality, yet shed more or less light upon it will now be noticed.

It is argued that Congress can not require a court of equity to try issues of fact by jury. That is unquestionably sound doctrine, and the case of Brown v. Kalamazoo, circuit judge (87 Mich., 274), is sound law. But it is wholly inapplicable here. No one has thus far ever insisted that contempt is of equitable cognizance, or other than what the textbooks designated, namely, a special proceeding, criminal in its nature, not necessarily connected with any particular suit or action pending in the court.

Numerous State cases were cited in argument. They may all be answered as a class. The relation between Congress and Federal courts is not the same as that between State legislature and the State courts. The constitutions of the various States themselves provide for and establish the court, partition the powers of government between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, prescribing safeguards, and defining their powers in detail; whereas the Federal Constitution has delegated full and complete control of the matter to Congress. Nor should the fact be overlooked that the State decisions on the subject are often based upon precedents of the common law, which is no part of the Federal system. Thus, in Ex parte McCowan (139 N. C., 95), that being typical of many such cases relied upon, it was said:

"We are satisfied that at common law the acts and conduct of the petitioner as set out in the case constitute a contempt of court, and if the statute does not embrace this case and in terms repeal the common law applicable to it, we would not hesitate to declare the statute in that respect unconstitutional and void for reasons which we will now state."

In Finck v. O'Neill (106 U. S. Rep., 272) it appeared that Congress has taken from the court all power to enforce its judgment, and the act of Congress was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case (p. 280) the court said:

"The United States can not enforce the collection of a debt from an unwilling debtor except by judicial process. They must bring a suit and obtain a judgment. To reap the fruit of that judgment they must cause an execution to issue. The courts have no inherent authority to take any one of these steps, except as it may have been conferred by the legislative department, for they can exercise no jurisdiction except as the law confers and limits it."

And in Cary v. Curtiss (3 How., 236, 254) the same court said:

"The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitutions and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law."

But in section 720 of the Revised Statutes we have a statute of Congress prohibiting the Federal courts from issuing injunctions in certain cases, and the constitutional validity of that statute was declared in Sharon v. Terry (36 Fed. R., 365). Now, the writ of injunction is the arm of the Federal courts in the exercise of their equitable powers, which it has been urged enjoy complete immunity from congressional action. And here a Federal circuit court sustained an act of Congress which subtracted an important part of equitable jurisdiction. Anyone taking the trouble to examine the judiciary act of 1789, with or without subsequent additions and amendments, will observe that it consists, in large part, of regulations of and limitations upon jurisdiction.

We close this head with the quotation from Ex parte Robinson (19 Wall., 505), cited with approval in the case of Bessette v. Conkey (194 U. S., 327), which is so clearly and obviously applicable and conclusive that no comment appears to be necessary:

"The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power, but the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 3, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and power from the Constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt; but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases—

"(1) Where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.

"(2) Where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transaction.

"(3) Where there has been disobedience or resistance by an officer, party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts. The law happily prescribes the punishment which the courts can impose for contempts. The seventeenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. L., 73) declares that the court shall have power to punish defiance of their authority in any cause or hearing before them by fine or imprisonment, at their discretion. The enactment is a limitation upon the manner in which the power shall be exercised and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment. The judgment of the court debarring the petitioner, treated as a punishment for contempt, was therefore unauthorized and void."

As to the other ground of objection urged—that is, that any interference with the full and complete dominion and discretion of the courts tends to disorganization and to the weakening of judicial authority—judging by the course of previous discussion on this measure, it is not anticipated that the policy of the provision placing a limitation upon the punishment which can be inflicted will be strenuously criticized, and, therefore, we will make no further comment on that.

TRIAL BY JURY.

The feature of the bill against which the most strenuous argument has been directed is that providing for jury trials. But no one has shown that such provision amounts to anything more than a change of procedure. So that the question comes down to this, Has Congress or not the power to prescribe procedure? The courts will still, if this bill passes, have all the substantive power left in their hands by the act of 1831. Not one of the acts there catalogued will have been eliminated. The method of ascertaining the facts in certain cases is changed, but their ascertainment is still under supervision of the court, and ample safeguards are provided against evasions and miscarriages of justice.

A contemnor, from the moment the facts are judicially ascertained, is, by uniform practice, either placed in durance or required to give bail. The result of an adverse judgment is always penal, both in form and effect, though the fine be sometimes turned over to a private litigant.

The manner of disposing of the fine does not alter, in any respect, the form and effect of the procedure or change it from criminal to civil.

SUCH LEGISLATION LONG DEMANDED.

The bill is an evolution from prolonged and varied discussion, by no means limited to a recent date or to the present Congress. Every feature and provision of it has been subjected to attack and defense, but the whole controversy appears to have at length converged upon the issue of whether or not the policy and practice of jury trial in contempt cases shall be admitted in the Federal jurisprudence at all.

That complaints have been made and irritation has arisen out of the trial of persons charged with contempt in the Federal courts is a matter of general and common knowledge. The charge most commonly made is that the courts, under the equity power, have invaded the criminal domain, and under the guise of trials for contempt have really convicted persons of substantive crimes for which, if indicted, they would have had a constitutional right to be tried by jury. It has been the purpose of your committee in this bill to meet this complaint, believing it to be a sound public policy so to adjust the processes of the courts as to disarm any legitimate criticism; and your committee confidently believes that, so far from weakening the power and effectiveness of Federal courts, this bill will remove a cause of just complaint and promote that popular affection and respect which is in the last resolve the true support of every form of governmental activity.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the demand on the Democratic side of this House for time is so great that it is absolutely impossible for the gentleman from Alabama—the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary—who has charge of this bill, to grant to the different Members on this side who desire to speak in favor of this measure as much time as they desire, and therefore I must be satisfied with the few minutes allotted me, which precludes me from speaking at length on the abuses that now exist and which the pending bill seeks to eliminate.

I am in favor of this bill, Mr. Speaker, but am of the opinion that it is not as broad as it should be. I would desire also to have it include those contempt proceedings that arise from suits or actions wherein the United States is a party, or where suits or actions are brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States. The bill is, however, a step forward in the right direction, and I am of the opinion that it will bring about a great deal of good and put a stop to the injunction abuses.

Mr. Speaker, within three minutes after I was sworn in as a Member of the Sixtieth Congress, namely, on December 2, 1907, I introduced a bill known as H. R. 148, which provided for trial by jury in all contempt proceedings. During the same session—on January 29, 1908—I introduced another bill known as H. R. 15647, which provided:

That any person or persons accused of violating or disobeying any preliminary, interlocutory, or final order of injunction of any nature, not committed in the actual presence of any court or judge, which injunction issued out of or was entered by any court or judge of any court of the United States, shall, before any penalty, fine, or imprisonment is imposed, be entitled to a trial by jury as to the guilt or innocence of such person or persons or for such offense; that is to say, in no case shall a penalty, fine, or imprisonment be imposed in such courts, or by any judge thereof, for any contempt or alleged contempt (except as hereinbefore provided) until an opportunity has been given said person or persons to be heard by jury: Provided also, That the judge who has issued said preliminary writ of injunction or any order or rule to show cause why a preliminary writ of injunction or any order in the nature of an injunction shall thereafter be disqualified from hearing or disposing of or from sitting in the trial of the matter so arising.

Mr. Speaker, you will observe that long before the then President of the United States, Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, made William H. Taft President, therefore long before he communicated his view on this subject to this House, I had been advocating and endeavoring to have legislation passed which would disqualify any judge issuing an injunction from hearing, or disposing of, or from sitting in the trial of the matter arising under the proceedings.

Bills of similar character were introduced by me in both the Sixty-first and Sixty-second Congresses. Every one of the bills introduced by me provided for a trial by jury in contempt proceedings and also provided for a change of venue. In the Sixtieth Congress, as well as in the Sixty-first Congress, Mr. Speaker, I made repeated demands and requests upon the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee for hearings upon my bills, and during those four years I did everything in my power to have the chairman of that committee grant me a hearing, but without avail. I regret exceedingly that the Republican Party, then in power, refused to listen to the demands made for this needful and just legislation. It therefore affords me much pleasure that we to-day, being in the majority, are ready to comply with the demands of the American people and also to know that within a very short time we will pass this bill, which I am sure will eliminate a great many of the abuses in our courts, and a bill for which I have incessantly worked ever since I became a Member of this body.

The main object of this bill is to prevent judges from abusing the injunctive powers of the courts. It will secure to all men when held in contempt a trial by jury—a right given them by the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, there is no other right for which the people the world over have contended with greater zeal than the right of trial by jury in all cases where alleged violations of the law have taken place and where the life, liberty, or property of any citizen has been involved. In this great and glorious country of ours the Constitution of the United States and of the several States guarantees that right. Many bloody wars have been waged; innumerable laws have been enacted; judges have been impeached and deposed in order to maintain that sacred right which has long been recognized as one of the pillars in the structure of human liberty.

This course has been made necessary because experience has demonstrated that judges are human and prone to human errors, and while many of them hear and determine such cases as come before them with conscientious care there are many who do not hesitate to stretch or break the law in their eagerness and desire to promote the interest of those who were instrumental in securing their appointment, and then again there are others who have hopes of additional honors and rewards.

Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that these classes not only exist in the United States courts, but they also exist in some of the State courts. Frequently we hear of judges being nominated and elected by the influences of special interests or political bosses and who will do their bidding by carrying out their wishes and orders. Only a few weeks ago one of the State judges in my county, on a Sunday night, to keep the boss in power, issued at the request of said boss and his attorney an injunction against the county judge, the sheriff, the chief of police, and election commissioners restraining them from the performance of their duties, from carrying out and executing a legal order protecting delegates duly elected under a direct primary law, in the performance of their duty; and because these duly elected and appointed officials did obey the mandate of the county judge by according protection to these duly elected delegates in a convention assembled he not only held all the peace officers, including the county judge, in contempt, but also imposed a fine of $500 upon them. All this was done to please the boss who dictated and forced his nomination. If such a law as we are now considering had been on our statute books and could have been made applicable to injunctions issued by State judges, I doubt if a single Member present believes such shameful procedure would have taken place.

For the reasons I have stated I am heartily in favor of this bill, and my only regret is that is does not apply to all contempts not committed in the presence of the court or judge.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to say that this is not the first beneficial measure which the Republicans have refused to consider. Invariably when a measure which has a tendency to be of benefit to the people at large is introduced and considered in this House we always find some one on that side of the House interposing an objection. Therefore I was not surprised to-day when my colleague [Mr. STERLING] argued for over an hour and a half endeavoring to show that the bill was unconstitutional. It is the same old story, the same old plea whenever the Republican Party desires to defeat meritorious measures and they have no just or reasonable grounds upon which to attack it.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is not only demanded by the American Federation of Labor and all other organized labor, but it is demanded by every right-thinking and honest man who believes in equal justice to all and special oppression and persecution to none.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] has 38 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] 21 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to occupy a part of his time now?

Mr. STERLING. If the gentleman has but one more speech, I will consume the balance of my time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that you said I had 38 minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has 38 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] 21 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] in all candor, that of the 38 minutes I expect to give to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] 30 minutes, and I desire to use 8 minutes myself in conclusion. Therefore I ask him to use his time now.

Mr. STERLING. It is consistent with practice, of course, for you on that side to close this debate, but you ought not to have the close in two speeches, but in one speech. However, if the gentleman insists on it, I will not object.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for 21 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion of this bill or resolution the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], among other things, made some remarks concerning a certain decision that had been referred to in the minority report from the Oklahoma Supreme Court. I could not understand distinctly all that the gentleman said, but I heard sufficient to know that the remarks he made were not complimentary to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma. I, of course, recognize the fact that the gentleman from Iowa did not intend any serious reflection on the courts of Oklahoma, and yet I do not like to hear such remarks without in a measure responding to them.

I presume that those who are familiar with the men who have occupied the Territorial supreme bench of Oklahoma, as well as the men who at present constitute the supreme court of our State, would recognize the fact that our courts have been of a very high grade and character, and that our judges, the men who have occupied those positions, have likewise been men eminently competent in every way, honorable men, men of high grade and character. I do not think that it is a very appropriate place here in this House for one to make remarks that reflect upon the courts or the institutions of another State. I think the gentleman from Iowa must have forgotten himself.

However, the decision referred to was a decision which was rendered while Oklahoma was a Territory, and not since statehood. It is true that during the period of our Territorial life we had a most excellent supreme court. Part of it was under a Democratic administration, with Democratic judges, and part of it was under a Republican administration. The judges were appointed by the President of the United States for their fitness and character for the high positions they occupied. But if there is anything wrong about that decision I think I understand the trouble. Those judges who served in Territorial days all came from some of the other States. I recall one that came from Indiana, and one that came from Missouri, and one that came from Nebraska, and another came from Iowa, educated in the schools and in the courts of Iowa—which may explain anything wrong in the decision referred to.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration proposes to amend the act approved March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary." The act referred to is amended by inserting after section 268 five new sections. The propositions in controversy rise largely out of the proposed new sections 268a, 268b, and 268d. That we may have this matter before us clearly, I quote from the bill as follows.

Section 268a provides as follows:

SEC. 268a. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

Section 268b in part provides as follows:

In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury; in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

Section 268d in full provides:

SEC. 268d. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 268a of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

These provisions indicate the changes which this bill proposes to make in the procedure in our Federal courts in certain contempt cases. The provisions of the bill apply only to proceedings in contempt when the act complained of be of such a character as to constitute a criminal offense under a statute of the United States or at common law, and in no case shall the provisions of the act apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to cases brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States.

QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

There seems to be two main questions involved in the provisions of this bill.

First. Are the provisions of the bill constitutional?

Second. Is the proposed legislation wise and proper?

I have not examined the authorities carefully with a view to determining the power of Congress to enact the proposed legislation. I have listened to the discussion of the question here to-day. I have concluded from this discussion that the provisions of this bill are constitutional and that the Congress, under the Constitution, may enact this legislation. The able and distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has delivered a most able address in which he stoutly contends that the proposed legislation is not within the power of Congress. The gentleman reasons with great force and clearness, and presents his views in a way that shows that he has given great study and research to the question, and we all recognize that he is honest and conscientious in his conclusions. I can not, however, agree with him that the legislation proposed in this act is unconstitutional, and I believe that if this bill shall become a law the courts will hold that Congress has not exceeded its power.

Believing that Congress has the constitutional power to enact the provisions of this bill, the next question to be considered is the character of the legislation. Is it wise? Is it proper? Will it contribute to the well-being of society? Will it strengthen the fabric of our Government? Will the results flowing from this legislation prove helpful to the people of this country? Or, on the other hand, is this dangerous legislation? Will it prove harmful? Will it weaken popular government? Will it tend to degrade our courts and bring them into disrepute among the people? Will such legislation encourage disorder, violence, and crime?

I have given some thought to these and similar questions. I have great respect for both our Federal and State courts. I believe as a rule our judges are honest, sincere, patriotic public officials. Our courts rank with the best in the world and are worthy the highest respect and confidence. The great respect which our people generally have for our courts is not because of the great power and authority which the law confers upon the courts or the judges. The people respect our judges and have confidence in our courts because as a rule the judges and our courts are entitled to respect and confidence.

After all, public sentiment is the highest law of the land. Our courts can not endure with a continued hostile and adverse public sentiment. Unless supported by public sentiment our courts must go down. Because in the end public sentiment will change precedents, overrule decisions, repeal laws, and amend constitutions.

Our Constitution carefully guards personal liberty and guarantees the right of trial by jury when one's life or liberty is involved. To confer upon judges in indirect contempt cases the power to punish by long imprisonments—by depriving a man of his liberty—would seem to be out of harmony with the provisions of the Constitution, which guarantees jury trial in criminal cases. Of course, we can not have courts unless the judges can preserve order, maintain the dignity of the court, and enforce their decrees. But the provisions of this bill do not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice. The object of this bill is not to destroy or weaken our courts, but to throw around our citizens an additional safeguard for the protection of liberty. This bill does not permit violations of the orders of our courts; it does not excuse such violations, but simply provides that in certain cases a person charged with contempt can not be punished until a jury has passed upon the facts.

I see no danger in such legislation, and I shall vote for the bill. I do not believe such legislation will encourage violence, disorder, or crime. It may be said that this proposed legislation comes before this House in response to the demands of organized labor. This should not prevent its passage. Organized labor is certainly entitled to be heard. It is labor that produces all our wealth. The welfare of our wage earners is the welfare of the Republic. Whatever contributes to the well-being of the men who do the work of the Nation adds to the strength and greatness of the Nation.

Labor organizations are not perfect, and the men who compose such organizations are human beings like the rest of us, and, of course, do not profess perfection. But labor unions have much to their credit for the good which they have accomplished. With organized capital now supreme in the land, labor unions are essential. Such organizations have done much to shorten the hours of labor, increase wages, improve conditions under which labor is performed, and to educate public sentiment to understand the rights of labor. We hear much of the conflict between capital and labor. In a sense there is such a conflict. But in the broadest sense there is no conflict between capital and labor. Employer and employees are interested in the prosperity and welfare of each other. I am for industrial peace. But if occasional conflicts come, let us not dispair. I believe the great body of American workmen are patriotic American citizens, firmly attached to our free institutions, and devoted to the principles of free government. I trust it may always be so. I believe we may contribute to this end by shaping our national legislation so as to recognize any reasonable demand of labor and make those who create the wealth of the Nation feel that their rights and interests are fully recognized and that they reap a reward commensurate with the labor performed.

REGULATION OF INJUNCTIONS.

We have, during this session of Congress, passed a bill which may be regarded as a companion of the measure now under consideration. I refer to H. R. 23635. It relates to the issuing of injunctions by the Federal courts. One of the important provisions of this bill is as follows:

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

I voted for the above law, as contained in the bill passed by this House May 14, 1912. In my judgment we should see that such laws are passed that will prevent judges from abusing the power of issuing injunctions and abusing the power to punish for contempt. It has been asserted that judges seldom abuse this power. I believe this is true. But we should, if possible, enact such laws as will prevent any abuse of this power. Such laws, I believe, will tend to increase respect for our courts and judges. Whenever power is lodged in a public official, we should throw around him wise restrictions to prevent, if possible, any abuse or misuse of this power. This, as I understand, is the very object of this proposed legislation relating to contempt and injunction proceedings. And so looking at this proposed legislation, I give the same my support and my vote.

We have in this country about 35,000,000 persons over 10 years of age engaged in gainful occupations. Eleven million of these are on the farm; 7,000,000 are engaged in domestic and personal service, including common laborers; 7,000,000 are engaged in trade and transportation; and 9,000,000 are engaged in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. It is this army of toilers that gives our country its wealth, its prosperity, its prestige abroad, and its real strength at home. In all our legislation we should keep in view the physical, intellectual, social, and moral uplift of this grand army of workers. Their advancement, their welfare, their happiness should at all times be paramount. Organized labor in numbers, it is true, constitutes but a small per cent of the total number of people engaged in gainful occupations. But all our wage earners reap advantages, benefits, and blessings from battles fought and won by organized labor. My hope is that the great body of our laboring men will continue as they are now—law-abiding, liberty-loving, loyal-hearted, patriotic American citizens. And so long as I shall be intrusted with legislative power in our National Legislative Assembly I shall vote for all measures which I believe will contribute to the welfare of labor, for I believe this is the best way to add strength to our Nation and insure the prosperity and happiness of all our 90,000,000 of people.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to yield to the distinguished statesman from Iowa, who has introduced a bill seeking to accomplish the purpose that this bill seeks to accomplish. I refer to that gallant young Iowan, Mr. KENDALL. [Applause.]

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I should have been very much more gratified if the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary could have found it convenient to give me additional time in lieu of the compliment which he has tendered me, although I am, of course, profoundly grateful for that.

Mr. CLAYTON. If I had had it, it would have been yielded to the gentleman and he would have edified the House. [Applause.]

Mr. KENDALL. I am sure the first half of the gentleman's proposition is correct. In the limited time available to me I want to elaborate somewhat the excellent argument advanced by my esteemed friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. WILSON, when he addressed the House this afternoon.

On the 14th day of last May this House, by a vote of 243 yeas to 31 nays, passed a bill, H. R. 23635, intended to regulate the issuance of injunctions, and I read that measure here because I want to refer to its provisions in connection with the legislation we are now considering:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 263 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, and that said act be further amended by inserting after section 266 thereof three new sections, to be numbered, respectively, 266a, 266b, and 266c, reading as follows:

"SEC. 263. That no injunction, whether interlocutory or permanent, in cases other than those described in section 266 of this title, shall be issued without previous notice and an opportunity to be heard on behalf of the parties to be enjoined, which notice, together with a copy of the bill of complaint or other pleading upon which the application for such injunction will be based, shall be served upon the parties sought to be enjoined a reasonable time in advance of such application. But if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court or judge that immediate and irreparable injury is likely to ensue to the complainant, and that the giving of notice of the application or the delay incident thereto would probably permit the doing of the act sought to be restrained before notice could be served or hearing had thereon, the court or judge may, in his discretion, issue a temporary restraining order without notice. Every such order shall be indorsed with the date and hour of issuance, shall be forthwith entered of record, shall define the injury and state why it is irreparable and why the order was granted without notice, and shall by its terms expire within such time after entry, not to exceed seven days, as the court or judge may fix, unless within the time so fixed the order is extended or renewed for a like period, after notice to those previously served, if any, and for good cause shown, and the reasons for such extension shall be entered of record.

"SEC. 266a. That no restraining order or interlocutory order of injunction shall issue except upon the giving of security by the applicant in such sum as the court or judge may deem proper, conditioned upon the payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who may be found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained thereby.

"SEC. 266b. That every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, shall be specific in terms, and shall describe in reasonable detail, and not by reference to the bill of complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained; and shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise have received actual notice of the same.

"SEC. 266c. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

"And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute; or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto."

Mr. Speaker, the protest against the abuse of the injunctive process has become national in its character. It is too respectable to be denounced as unreasoning clamor and it is too insistent to be ignored as temporary discontent. Throughout the country there is a confirmed conviction that the equity powers of the Federal judiciary have been employed not exclusively to preserve property from destruction, but frequently to compel the settlement of industrial disputes. [Applause.] In his annual message to Congress, submitted December 3, 1906, the President recognized the situation in the following language:

> There must be no hesitation in dealing with disorder. But there must likewise be no such abuse of the injunctive power as is implied in forbidding laboring men to strive for their own betterment in peaceful and lawful ways; nor must the injunction be used merely to aid some big corporation to carry out schemes for its own aggrandizement. It must be remembered that a preliminary injunction in a labor case, if granted without adequate proof—even when authority can be found to support the conclusions of law upon which it is founded—may often settle the dispute between the parties, and therefore if improperly granted may do irreparable wrong.

Again, on January 31, 1908, the same high authority declared in a communication to Congress:

> It is all wrong to use the injunction to prevent the entirely proper and legitimate actions of labor organizations in their struggle for industrial betterment, or under the guise of protecting property rights unwarrantably to invade the fundamental rights of the individual. It is futile to concede, as we all do, the right and necessity of organized effort on the part of the wage earners, and yet by injunctive process to forbid peaceable action to accomplish the lawful objects for which they are organized and upon which their success depends.

While the recommendations of the Executive are not, as matter of course, to be adopted by the Congress, they may be accepted in this instance as establishing a widespread dissatisfaction with the practice obtaining in the United States courts. This body, in House bill 23635, which I have just read, undertook to enact legislation to remedy the evils complained of. That measure, if it shall become effective, will make impossible the issuance of injunctions (a) without reasonable notice to all concerned, (b) without including the names of all persons affected, (c) without abundant indemnity against damage that may be sustained, (d) without specific detail of acts and conduct enjoined by the order. These provisions are of general application and encountered but little opposition when they were under discussion in the House. But the concluding section, 266c, relates particularly to the interference of equity courts in labor controversies, and provoked elaborate discussion. It provides that in such disputes no injunction shall issue unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or property rights, and that these rights must be specifically defined by verified application; and it crystallizes into the law the most intelligent opinions of the most authoritative tribunals concerning those things which, in the enlightened judgment of this age, are permissible to be done by workingmen in a labor disagreement. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to represent on this floor many thousands of wage earners. They are as intelligent, as industrious, as peaceable, as law-abiding as any citizenship beneath the flag. [Applause.] But they do not understand that the obligations of patriotism require them to believe in government by injunction or to surrender the right of trial by jury. [Applause.]

Now, the pending bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after section 268 thereof five new sections, to be numbered, respectively, 268a, 268b, 268c, 268d, and 268e, reading as follows:

"SEC. 268 a. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 268 b. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused person is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

"In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury; in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

"If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them, as the court may direct; but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of $1,000, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months.

"SEC. 268 c. That the evidence taken upon the trial of any person so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon writ of error in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified as justice may require. Upon the granting of such writ of error execution of judgment shall be stayed, and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court or by any justice or any judge of any district court of the United States.

"SEC. 268 d. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 268 a of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

"SEC. 268 e. That no proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act."

This measure, which is designed to regulate the procedure in prosecutions for contempt must be considered as complementary to H. R. 23635, to which I have just referred, controlling the issuance of injunctions. If they are both finally incorporated into our system of law, it will not be possible in the future for the process of injunction to be invoked and abused in labor controversies as it has been in the past. [Applause.] No court then will be authorized to entertain an application for the restraint of men in the adoption of all lawful and peaceable methods to secure a redress of grievances against their employers. They may assemble, they may engage in discussion, they may strike, they may persuade their associates to unite with them, they may refuse to patronize any party to a disagreement, they may provide for strike benefits—in short, they may do any and all things to promote the success of their struggle so long as no statute is violated. [Applause.]

All these rights are guaranteed to workingmen by H. R. 23635, and no equity court may interpose its power to deny them. The bill now under consideration extends the measure of their protection, although by omitting to render all indirect contempts triable by jury it is not as comprehensive as the friends of the reform desire. In some respects, however, it is an improvement over the bill I introduced seeking to effectuate the same purpose, and for that reason it commands my earnest support. It simply provides that if the violation of the injunction be alleged and the act constituting the violation be criminal in its character, then the defendant shall be entitled to trial by a jury of his countrymen. The authorities which have been cited by the eminent lawyer who presides over the committee reporting the bill remove all doubt that Congress possesses the constitutional power to enact this legislation. The remaining question is one of expediency. Is it necessary? Is it wise? Is it approved by high considerations of public policy?

The practice which we seek to correct is of modern development, and the abuse which we hope to remedy is of recent origin. As was said by Judge Henry Clay Caldwell, one of the ablest of the many able jurists produced by my own State:

> The modern writ of injunction is used for purposes which bear no more resemblance to the uses of the ancient writ of that name than the milky way bears to the sun. Formerly it was used to conserve the property in dispute between private litigants, but in modern times it has taken the place of the police powers of the State. With it the judge not only restrains in punishing the commission of crimes defined by statute, but he proceeds to frame a criminal code of his own as extended as he sees proper, by which various acts in a suit of law and morals are made criminal, such as standing, walking, or marching on the public highway, or talking, speaking, or preaching and other like acts. In proceedings for contempt for an alleged violation of the injunction the judge is the lawmaker, the injured party, the prosecutor, the court, and the jury. It is not surprising that, uniting in himself all these characters, he is commonly able to obtain a conviction.

The conditions described by Judge Caldwell are admitted to exist, and it is to terminate them that this legislation is necessary.

I am sure we were all much diverted by the discussion indulged in by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and by the supposititious case which he conjured up out of his fertile imagination. He advanced the novel notion that no defendant accused of contempt could avail himself of the provisions of this bill unless he first establish his own guilt of a criminal offense. I was surprised that a lawyer of his reputation and a legislator of his experience should submit a proposition so essentially unsound and insist upon it with apparent seriousness. Mr. Speaker, no difficulty whatever will be encountered in the administration of this measure if it shall be enacted into law. Where an injunction has issued and a complaint is presented that the order of the court has been violated, the complaint itself will of necessity disclose the character of the act constituting the alleged contempt.

If it is not criminal in its nature, the court will proceed to adjudicate the issue; if it is criminal in its nature, the defendant will be entitled to trial by jury precisely as if he were indicted for the offense. [Applause.] And this because his liberty is jeopardized in the result of the proceeding. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will yield the gentleman two minutes more if he desires it.

Mr. KENDALL. I thank my friend from Alabama. The fundamental principle involved is one of the utmost importance to every citizen. The fathers who established this Government were so devoted to the conviction that no man should be deprived of his liberty, except upon the verdict of his peers after impartial trial, that they anchored that proposition in the Constitution itself when that charter of democracy was ordained. [Applause.] It is not a privilege, as some gentlemen in this debate have designated it; it is a right invaluable and inalienable. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, this bill contemplates no assault upon the courts. I have practiced law all my adult years, and when I have finished my labors here I expect to resume my pursuit of that noblest of professions. I allow none of my associates on this floor to surpass me in proper respect for the judiciary, but I do not acknowledge the unquestioning reverence for that institution which some of them appear to experience. It is profitable for us to remember that, after all, a judge is only a lawyer transferred to the bench—no different in temperament or character than before his elevation to the judicial office.

The system under which we have been operating can no longer be successfully defended. [Applause.] A chancellor, appointed for life and responsible to nobody, issues an injunction invading the natural rights of men and then, when a violation is alleged, he appropriates to himself the functions of prosecutor, court, and executioner. [Applause.] This situation is intolerable, and it is to correct it that this legislation is universally demanded. I am gratified that Congress is finally about to respond to the overwhelming sentiment of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 30 minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, there is a widespread demand among lawyers and laymen throughout the United States for some curbing or limitations upon the power of the Federal court judges who both try and punish for contempt. As to the policy of this bill, I shall not discuss it at great length. As to the constitutionality of it, I want to devote a few minutes, and, of course, I must necessarily abbreviate my argument in order to bring it within the limit of time assigned to me.

In the first place, I want to get into the RECORD a brief synopsis of the bill.

Section 1, 268a, provides that anyone who willfully violates the writ of any district court by doing anything forbidden to be done by him, if the thing constituted also a criminal offense against the United States law or the common law, shall be proceeded against in the following manner, to wit, section 2: When shown by the return of the officer or by the affidavit of some credible person or by information filed by the district attorney that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of contempt, as set forth in section 1, or 268a, any judge sitting may issue a rule to show cause why such person shall not be punished. If upon return or answer the contempt be not sufficiently purged, in the opinion of the court, the court shall direct a trial at a certain time and place, and if the accused fail or refuse to answer he may be compelled by the court to give bond for his appearance and for his submission to final judgment of the court.

In all cases covered by this act, such trial may be by the court, or, upon the demand of the accused, by a jury; and the jury may be impaneled from those in attendance, or the judge at chambers may cause a sufficient number to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, and the jury shall be impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor, and the trial shall conform as near as may be to the practice of criminal cases.

If the accused is found guilty, the judge shall prescribe the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in his discretion, and the fine shall be paid to the United States or to the party or parties injured, as the court may direct; provided that in no case shall the fine paid to the United States exceed $1,000, if the accused is a natural person, and the imprisonment shall not exceed six months in jail.

Section 3, or 266c, provides that the evidence taken at this trial may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment may be reviewed upon writ of error as now provided by law in criminal cases, and upon granting such writ of error execution of judgment shall be stayed, and the accused, if sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such sum as the court or any justice or any judge of the district court may deem proper.

Section 4, or 268d, provides that this act shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts growing out of the disobedience of any order in any suit brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States.

Section 5, or 268e, makes the statute of limitations in such contempt cases and in all contempt cases one year from the act complained of. Nor shall any such proceeding bar a criminal prosecution for the same act or acts. Nothing in this act shall affect any proceeding for contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. Speaker, it is needless to tell this House that the Judiciary Committee worked long, patiently, and faithfully upon this measure. It is a delicate question, and we realized it. We tried to avoid Scylla and at the same time we did not want to run into Charybdis, and we believe, and sincerely believe, that we have a good bill. It does not go as far as some Members would have it go, because many Members believe in the trial of all indirect contempts by jury. Finally we have evolved this bill, which, to me, seems to be the fairest and subject to least objection, and I am really surprised that my friends on the other side should oppose it at all. Their objection which they urge against it indirectly is that it does not go far enough after all. I believe the time will come when possibly all indirect contempts will be tried by jury, and that this bill may be only a step in that direction.

Having read the bill and its provisions, I want to read an excerpt from the pen of that great judge, Henry Clay Caldwell, who was appointed a Federal judge in 1864 by Abraham Lincoln, and who served as a Federal judge for 39 years:

> The modern writ of injunction is used for purposes which bear no more resemblance to the uses of the ancient writ of that name than the milky way bears to the sun. Formerly it was used to conserve the property in dispute between private litigants, but in modern times it has taken the place of the police powers of the State and Nation. It enforces and restrains with equal facility the criminal laws of the State and Nation. * * * In proceedings for contempt for an alleged violation of the injunction the judge is the lawmaker, the injured party, the prosecutor, the judge, and the jury. It is not surprising that uniting in himself all these characters he is commonly able to obtain a conviction. While the penalty which the judge can inflict by direct sentence for a violation of his code is fine or imprisonment, limited only by his discretion, capital punishment may be inflicted by indirection. All that seems to be necessary to this end is to issue a writ to the marshal or sheriff commanding him to prevent a violation of the judge's code, and then the men, with injunction nooses around their necks, may be quickly dispatched if they attempt to march across this injunction deadline. It is said the judge does not punish for a violation of the statutory offense but only for a violation of his order prohibiting the commission of the statutory offense. Such reasoning as this is what Carlyle calls "logical cobwebbery." The web is not strong enough to deprive the smallest insect of its liberty, much less an American citizen * * *. A jurisdiction that is not required to stop somewhere will stop nowhere.
> Prof. Baird says fish have no maturity, but continue to grow until they die. This curious characteristic of fish is present in a very intensified form in the equitable octopus called injunction, for that has no maturity and never dies, and its jurisdiction grows and extends perpetually and unceasingly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman state what volume and page he is reading from?

Mr. WEBB. I am reading from the American Federationist of 1910, from what purports to be an address by this distinguished jurist, published in that magazine.

I want to address myself now for a few minutes to the proposition that has been so stubbornly fought here this afternoon, that the Congress has the power to limit the judge's power to try and punish for contempts. To begin with, the point has been made that the Congress has no right to deprive a judge of the power to punish for contempt, and in answer I want to say that this bill does not do that. This bill does not deprive the judge of the power to punish for contempt. He has the power to punish disobedience of his orders, provided the defendant is found guilty by a tribunal of 12 men. The bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], which he will offer as a substitute, itself is an argument against his own position here this afternoon, because section 2 of his bill provides that if any man accused of contempt of a judge's order shall file a written statement alleging that in his opinion the judge whose order he has violated is biased, right then and there, eo instanti, the tribunal is changed and a new judge is to try the issue of guilt and inflict the punishment.

Now, pray tell me if you have the power to transfer the trial of a contempt case from one judge to another and new judge, tell me why you can not transfer the question of guilt or innocence of the accused to a jury to ascertain whether or not the offense has been committed. It is a question of fact to be determined first by a proper tribunal, and most of these arguments on the other side this afternoon have been an indirect assault upon the entire jury system, the most perfect system ever devised by man up to the present hour to determine controversies between man and man. The star chamber in England tried to abolish it and brought revolution in its effort to do so, but this country's jurisprudence will never decline and our country will always remain strong and great so long as the jury system is preserved inviolate and incorrupt. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to state here that in the early history of this country this very point was practically raised as to whether or not these inferior courts established by Congress could have their powers limited by Congress. The Constitution does say the judicial power of the United States shall be vested or shall rest in one supreme court and in such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time establish. I take it that if you run down the decisions from 1799 to the present time you will not find a decision of any court but what says that these inferior courts are absolutely and entirely the creatures of Congress, and surely the power that can create can also limit the power of the creature. Inherent powers! There are no inherent powers in any inferior court. The only power that the district court possesses is that prescribed by Congress—the body that creates it—otherwise we could bring into being a power that would be superior to the creator. The power to punish for contempt, according to my friend's [Mr. STERLING's] own bill, is shown not to be inherent in inferior courts. If such power is inherent, you have no right to provide, as you do in your bill, a limit to the punishment.

If the power to punish were inherent in all inferior courts, there would be no limitation upon such power except the constitutional provision that there shall be no cruel or unusual punishment, and yet my friend from Illinois, good lawyer that he is, provides in his bill that the fine shall not be over $1,000 and the imprisonment be not more than six months. You take away from the court the inherent power, if it have such power, to punish for contempt when you undertake to limit that power. If you can make a limitation of that power to six months' imprisonment, you can make it 30 days; and if you can make it 30 days you can make it 30 minutes, and if you can limit it to 30 minutes you can bring it to nothing and abolish the power altogether. Has every inferior court the power to try a case between man and man or between a State and State? Take the court in New York, the Customs Court, or take the Court of Commerce, and they are inferior courts, but their powers are strictly limited by Congress, which created them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman from North Carolina to say that the present occupant of the White House, in his letter of acceptance some three or four years ago, conceded the power of Congress to designate another judge to try a contempt case? Then if Congress has the power to designate another judge to pass upon the question of facts in a contempt proceeding, can not Congress with equal propriety and with equal effect provide that a jury shall pass upon the facts as provided for in this bill?

Mr. WEBB. That is the argument I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, and the first authority I wish to cite in this connection was written in 1799 in the case of Turner against The Bank of North America, and in that case the very argument was made that has been made here this afternoon by gentlemen on the other side, to wit, Mr. Ellsworth——

Mr. STERLING. What page?

Mr. WEBB. Page 9; and you will find it in Fourth Dallas.

> It is, then, to be remarked that the judicial power is the grant of the Constitution, and Congress can no more limit than enlarge the constitutional grant.

Then Judge Ellsworth, Chief Justice at that time, interrupted this argument and said:

> How far is it meant to carry this argument? Will it be affirmed that in every case to which the judicial power of the United States extends the Federal courts may exercise the jurisdiction, without the intervention of the legislature, to distribute and regulate the power?

Justice Chase said:

> The notion has frequently been entertained that the Federal courts derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, but the political truth is that the disposal of the judicial power (except in a few specified instances) belongs to Congress. If Congress has given the power to this court, we possess it, not otherwise; and if Congress has not given the power to us or to any other court, it still remains at the legislative disposal. Besides, Congress is not bound, and it would, perhaps, be inexpedient, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to every subject in every form which the Constitution might warrant.

That was in 1799, and, gentlemen, from that good hour to this the suggestions of Chief Justice Chase and Judge Ellsworth have been followed.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I would like very much to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], but I have only 14 minutes remaining, and I can not discuss this question in that time. If I had the time I would gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STERLING. It is only a question, not a statement.

Mr. WEBB. I would not be discourteous to the gentleman for the world, and he knows that.

Mr. STERLING. I have yielded very generally this afternoon.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman will remember that I did not ask him a single question or interrupt him once. I understand the gentleman means it was a question of jurisdiction the court passed upon. The question of jurisdiction is a power which inheres in the court. If it has no jurisdiction, it is no court and has no power, and with equal force my friend could argue that we can not deprive an inferior court of jurisdiction, though we create such court.

Now, in The United States against Hudson, page 31, in Seventh Cranch, we find this expression:

Of all the courts which the United States may, under their general powers, constitute, one only, the Supreme Court, possesses jurisdiction derived immediately from the Constitution, and of which the legislative power can not deprive it. All other courts created by the General Government possess no jurisdiction but what is given them by the power that creates them, and can be vested with none but what the power ceded to the General Government will authorize them to confer. * * * For the power which Congress possess to create courts of inferior jurisdiction necessarily implies the power to limit the jurisdiction of those courts to particular objects; and when a court is created and its operations confined to certain specific objects, with what propriety can it assume to itself a jurisdiction much more extended, in its very nature very indefinite, applicable to a great variety of subjects, varying in every State in the Union, and with regard to which there exists no definite criterion of distribution between the district and circuit courts of the same district?

Now, next we come to Third Howard, on page 245, Cary against Curtis—and I may say that this decision was affirmed in Fink against O'Neil, in One hundred and sixth United States. Says the court:

Secondly, in the doctrine so often ruled in this court, that the judicial power of the United States, although it has its origin in the Constitution, is (except in enumerated instances applicable exclusively to this court) dependent for its distribution and organization, and for the modes of its exercise, entirely upon the action of Congress, who possess the sole power of creating the tribunals (inferior to the Supreme Court) for the exercise of the judicial power and of investing them with jurisdiction, either limited, concurrent, or exclusive, and of withholding jurisdiction from them in the exact degrees and character which to Congress may seem proper for the public good. To deny this position would be to elevate the judicial over the legislative branch of the Government and to give to the former powers limited by its own discretion merely. It follows, then, that the courts created by statute must look to the statute as the warrant for their authority; certainly they can not go beyond the statute and assert an authority with which they may not be invested by it or which may be clearly denied to them. * * * The existence of the judicial act itself, with its several supplements, furnishes proof unanswerable on this point. The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitution, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription or by the common law.

What can be stronger, gentlemen, than that decision rendered in Third Howard and reaffirmed in One hundred and sixth United States in the case of Fink against O'Neil, at page 280?

Now, here is still another authority to which I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House, found in Forty-ninth United States, or Eighth Howard:

Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers.

It is absurd, it seems to me, to hold that the creator can create a thing which after it is created becomes bigger and more powerful than its creator. It was never so intended by the founders of the Government, and it is opposed to the genius of our institutions to suppose a thing created can become more powerful than the people who created it. Now, in this decision, Judge Grier, rendering it, says:

It must be admitted that if the Constitution had ordained or established the inferior courts, and distributed to them their respective powers, they could not be restricted or divested by Congress.

Nobody undertakes to say that we can restrict or divest the power of the Supreme Court of the United States, because that court was created by the Constitution and that is the distinction this judge draws here:

But as it has made no such distribution, one of two consequences must result—either that each inferior court created by Congress must exercise all the judicial powers not given to the Supreme Court, or that Congress, having the power to establish the courts, must define their respective jurisdictions. The first of these inferences has never been asserted, and could not be defended with any show of reason, and if not, the latter would seem to follow as a necessary consequence, and it would seem to follow also that, having a right to prescribe, Congress may withhold from any court of its creation jurisdiction of any of the enumerated controversies. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers. No one of them can assert a just claim to jurisdiction exclusively conferred on another or withheld from all.

The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit court; consequently the statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution, unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.

Such has been the doctrine held by this court since its first establishment. To enumerate all the cases in which it has been either directly advanced or tacitly assumed would be tedious and unnecessary.

I cite still another authority, Mr. Speaker. It is in Eighteenth Wallace, page 577, and is known as the case of the Sewing Machine Companies. It bears out the decision which I have just read. It is as follows:

Circuit courts do not derive their judicial power immediately from the Constitution, as appears with sufficient explicitness from the Constitution itself, as the first section of the third article provides that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Consequently the jurisdiction of the circuit court in every case must depend upon some act of Congress, as it is clear that Congress, inasmuch as it possesses the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, may also define their jurisdiction. Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction in controversies between party and party but such as the statute confers. Congress, it may be conceded, may confer such jurisdiction upon the circuit courts as it may see fit within the scope of the judicial power of the Constitution not vested in the Supreme Court, but as such tribunals are neither created by the Constitution nor is their jurisdiction defined by that instrument, it follows that inasmuch as they are created by an act of Congress it is necessary in every attempt to define their power, to look to that source as the means of accomplishing that end. Federal judicial power, beyond all doubt, has its origin in the Constitution, but the organization of the system and the distribution of the subjects of jurisdiction among such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish, within the scope of the judicial power, always have been and of right must be the work of the Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in Nineteenth Wallace, at pages 510 and 511, we have a contempt case. The syllabus says:

The act of March 2, 1831, entitled "An act declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court," provides in its first section:

"That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts."

Mr. CLAYTON. That is Ex parte Robinson?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that is Ex parte Robinson. Mr. Justice Field, in that case, after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts; its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders, and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power. But the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 2, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may perhaps be a matter of doubt. But that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases: First, where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; second, where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transactions; and, third, where there has been disobedience or resistance by any officer, party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts.

There are three classes of cases. There is no inherent power suggested there, because the Supreme Court says that Congress has the right to limit the power of the courts of this country to punish for contempt to three classes of cases. Now, if Congress can reduce them to three, it can reduce them to one, and if they reduce them to one, Congress can destroy contempt cases altogether, and if Congress destroys them altogether, why can not it say that in certain cases a jury must intervene and determine whether or not the party is guilty before the judge shall inflict punishment?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I regret that I can not. I want to conclude this argument.

But, says the court, the power is limited. What power? The power to punish for contempt. By whom is it limited? Nobody but the lawmaking power can do it, and the court says it can do it in this case, and the power has been limited and defined by act of Congress of March 2, 1831. Justice Field says:

> The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may perhaps be a matter of doubt.

We find in this case in Nineteenth Wallace, 86 United States—

> That we can limit the power over contempt in the circuit and district courts. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in three classes of cases.

This is a direct decision in point, gentlemen of the House, which declares that the Congress has the power to limit the punishment to three classes of cases, and if it has the power to limit the punishment to three classes of cases, we can limit that power to one class of cases, or abolish it altogether. I contend that if Congress desires to take away from the inferior courts all power to punish for contempt it can do it.

Mr. CLAYTON. And Congress has the power to abolish inferior courts?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. We could abolish the circuit courts of the United States, which we have done, and the Commerce Court, the district courts, and all the courts, except the Supreme Court, and therefore it is absurd to argue that while we have the power to destroy we have not the power to regulate the thing we create.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in One hundred and forty-seven United States we find this decision:

> The Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power of the United States, but has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit court, consequently the statute which does prescribe the limits of their jurisdiction can not be in conflict with the Constitution, unless it confers powers not enumerated therein.

Gentlemen, I realize that this presentation has been very imperfect, because I have had to make it very hurriedly. In conclusion I refer again to this great Judge Caldwell, who was on the bench for 39 years, who says, after 39 years' experience as an inferior court judge, first as a district judge and then as a presiding member of the circuit court for 13 years, that the people need not fear the tyrannical power of inferior court judges, because the power and the right rests in the people through their Representatives in Congress to prescribe the bounds and to set the limits to which those courts may go.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] and I look at this question from different points of view, but I can not see how any lawyer can read all these authorities, from 1799 to the present, and then contend that the people who create these courts through their Representatives in Congress have no right to provide that before a man shall be convicted of crime by a judge there shall be flung between him and the judge's arbitrary power a jury of 12 men, one of the most sacred institutions in all the world, and especially to the people of the United States, simply to pass upon the facts and say whether he is guilty. If the man is guilty, the judge has all the power he needs to punish, provided it does not exceed six months' imprisonment or a fine of $1,000. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask that the gentleman from Illinois include in his request all gentlemen who have spoken on this bill.

Mr. STERLING. I will include them in my request. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this bill be given five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill in the RECORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. I join in that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this bill shall have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have four minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. CLAYTON. In that short time I can not hope to answer the many captious objections that have been urged against this bill. I now ask unanimous consent to print as a part of my remarks Report No. 613 on this pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing Report No. 613 on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 613, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

PROCEDURE IN CONTEMPT CASES.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 22591:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration H. R. 22591, to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, report the same back with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill leaves section 268 of the judicial code, formerly section 725 of the Revised Statutes, in full force and inserts five new sections, none of whose provisions conflict with said section 268.

ANALYSIS OF BILL.

By section 268a, in such cases of contempt specified in section 268 as constitute a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law, the proceedings against the accused party shall be "as hereinafter provided"; that is, in the subsequent section of the bill.

Most of the important provisions of the bill are contained in section 268b. Before action by the court, except in the cases excepted from the operation of the bill, there must be presented a formal charge showing reasonable ground; and before the party is put upon trial he must be afforded an opportunity to purge himself of any actual or technical contempt which he may have committed. He can not be arrested until he has opportunity to either purge himself or make answer and has refused to do either. If arrested, or in case the matter can not be disposed of on the return day, he may be required to give bail.

The trial is by the court (1) in case no jury be demanded by the accused, (2) if the contempt be in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, or (3) if the contempt be charged to be in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name or on behalf of the United States. In other cases the trial is to be by jury.

Section 268c provides for the preservation of bills of exception, for review upon writ of error, for stay of execution pending proceeding, for review, and for bail in case the accused shall have been sentenced to imprisonment.

Section 268d excepts from the operation of the act contempts in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, and contempts committeed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, and provides that in the excepted cases, as well as in all other cases not specifically embraced within section 268a, the punishment shall be in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

Section 268e bars proceedings for contempt unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of, and preserves the right of criminal prosecution, notwithstanding any proceeding and punishment for the contempts covered by the bill. It also excepts from the provisions of the bill any proceedings for contempt pending at the time of its passage.

Thus it is seen that the bill applies and gives a jury trial, with the exception noted, in all proceedings for contempt wherein the acts alleged to have been committed constitute a criminal offense, either under any Federal statute or at common law. The trial where a jury is had is governed (sec. 268b) as near as is practicable by the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

Before calling further attention to the provisions of the bill now reported it is apropriate to review some of the contentions of those who have opposed every form of legislation whatever on this subject.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

All the grounds of objection are reducible to two heads:

First. That any legislation whatever materially limiting or curtailing the power of the courts in the trial of contempts is unconstitutional.

Second. That any interference with the full and complete domination or discretion of the judge in contempt cases tends to disorganization and a weakening of judicial efficiency.

Let us consider first the constitutional objections.

It is said that although the courts inferior to the Supreme Court owe their existence and jurisdiction to congressional action, yet a distinction should be made between the jurisdiction and judicial power, for instance, in the citation, trial, and punishment of a party charged with contempt of court.

The controversy goes back over 60 years. In 1831 Congress passed an act limiting the power of the courts subjectively; that is to say, it lopped off some of the jurisdiction which the court had assumed and exercised—a jurisdiction, or power, if the latter term be preferred, which Congress believed, and by its legislation asserted, was a usurpation. Never, until within a very recent period, was the authority of Congress to do that questioned, either by the courts or by any respectable authority. The particular circumstance or event instigating the act of 1831 was the punishment by Judge Peck in Missouri, as for a contempt of court, of a party who had criticized one of his decisions in the columns of a newspaper.

The law before the act of 1831 read thus:

> The said courts shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths, and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority.

The act of 1831 consisted in the addition of a proviso, reading as follows:

> Provided, That such power to punish contempt shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said court in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said court.

The extensive scope of this amendatory statute has been generally overlooked. The Federal courts were assuming and exercising the unlimited and unchecked powers resorted to by common-law courts, of deciding for themselves, not only the mode of procedure and degree and amount of punishment, but of selecting for themselves particular acts of alleged misconduct which should be placed in the category of contempts. Congress treated the term "power" as synonymous with "jurisdiction," circumscribed the field of jurisdiction, specified the acts which should constitute contempts, and said that such power or jurisdiction shall not extend beyond these specified acts.

It has been suggested that Congress might have refused to create the inferior courts, or even the Supreme Court, and have thus caused the failure of the Government.

But it is said that when Congress has acted and established a Federal court the common-law and equity powers of the courts immediately flow into these judicial receptacles out of the Constitution. It is only necessary to examine this new doctrine to know to what absurdities it would lead. The common-law courts of England, with the King's bench at their head, in addition to administering statutory law and the common law proper, exercised certain parliamentary powers. In the English system the legislative and judicial departments were, and are, entirely independent of each other. It is true that the courts were bound by acts of Parliament as construed by them, but outside the statutes their powers were as free from limitation as those of Parliament itself. They were the exponents and final arbiters of public policy for the Kingdom.

Though it is often said that the three departments of our Government are separate and independent, which is true in the sense that they must not invade each other's constitutional domain, and thus destroy each other, yet it is also true that arbitrary unchecked power does not abide with either of them. As the Supreme Court has well expressed it, in Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S. Rep., 369):

> When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power.

To concede that the courts might, even with the limits fixed in the act of 1831, exclusively decide when a contempt has been committed, and the amount or degree of punishment, with no power in Congress to set a limit thereto, would be to concede to the courts the power to annul every act of Congress, to paralyze the Executive arm, to confiscate all property, and destroy all liberty. Of course, few, if any, believe that the courts would ever proceed to such extremes, but it is sufficient to say that, according to our interpretation, the framers of the Constitution took care to safeguard the people against the possibilities of all such calamitous tendencies.

Referring to this bill, and comparing its provisions with the proviso added in 1831, it is seen that the bill only changes the procedure in contempt cases, while, as before stated, that proviso limited the jurisdiction subjectively.

The opposition was represented before the committee by able counsel and many authorities were cited, few of which, however, in our opinion, had any direct bearing on the question from a constitutional point of view. In fact, the power of Congress, as exhibited in the act of 1831, was so generally and uniformly conceded that not a single case has been found which ever questioned or doubted it. A few cases which, though not directly bearing upon the point of constitutionality, yet shed more or less light upon it will now be noticed.

It is argued that Congress can not require a court of equity to try issues of fact by jury. That is unquestionably sound doctrine, and the case of Brown v. Kalamazoo, circuit judge (87 Mich., 274), is sound law. But it is wholly inapplicable here. No one has thus far ever insisted that contempt is of equitable cognizance, or other than what the textbooks designated, namely, a special proceeding, criminal in its nature, not necessarily connected with any particular suit or action pending in the court.

Numerous State cases were cited in argument. They may all be answered as a class. The relation between Congress and Federal courts is not the same as that between State legislature and the State courts. The constitutions of the various States themselves provide for and establish the court, partition the powers of government between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, prescribing safeguards, and defining their powers in detail; whereas the Federal Constitution has delegated full and complete control of the matter to Congress. Nor should the fact be overlooked that the State decisions on the subject are often based upon precedents of the common law, which is no part of the Federal system. Thus, in Ex parte McCowan (139 N. Car., 95), that being typical of many such cases relied upon, it was said:

> We are satisfied that at common law the acts and conduct of the petitioner, as set out in the case, constitute a contempt of court, and if the statute does not embrace this case and in terms repeal the common law applicable to it, we would not hesitate to declare the statute in that respect unconstitutional and void for reasons which we will now state.

In Finck v. O'Neill (106 U. S. Rept., 272) it appeared that Congress has taken from the court all power to enforce its judgment, and the act of Congress was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case (p. 280) the court said:

> The United States can not enforce the collection of a debt from an unwilling debtor, except by judicial process. They must bring a suit and obtain a judgment. To reap the fruit of that judgment they must cause an execution to issue. The courts have no inherent authority to take any one of these steps, except as it may have been conferred by the legislative department; for they can exercise no jurisdiction except as the law confers and limits it.

And in Cary v. Curtiss (3 How., 236, 254) the same court said:

> The courts of the United States are all limited in their nature and constitutions, and have not the powers inherent in courts existing by prescription, or by the common law.

But in section 720 of the Revised Statutes we have a statute of Congress prohibiting the Federal courts from issuing injunctions in certain cases, and the constitutional validity of that statute was declared in Sharon v. Terry (36 Fed. R., 365). Now, the writ of injunction is the arm of the Federal courts in the exercise of their equitable powers, which it has been urged enjoy complete immunity from congressional action. And here a Federal circuit court sustained an act of Congress which subtracted an important part of equitable jurisdiction. Anyone taking the trouble to examine the judiciary act of 1789, with or without subsequent additions and amendments, will observe that it consists, in large part, of regulations of and limitations upon jurisdiction.

We close this head with the quotation from Ex parte Robinson (19 Wall., 505), cited with approval in the case of Bessette v. Conkey (194 U. S., 327), which is so clearly and obviously applicable and conclusive that no comment appears to be necessary:

> The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence and invested with jurisdiction over any subject they became possessed of this power, but the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 3, 1831. The act, in terms, applies to all courts. Whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and power from the Constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt; but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is, therefore, to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases.
> (1) Where there has been misbehavior of a person in the presence of the courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice.
>
> (2) Where there has been misbehavior of any officer of the courts in his official transaction.
> (3) Where there has been disobedience or resistance by an officer, party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts. The law happily prescribes the punishment which the courts can impose for contempts. The seventeenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. L., 73) declares that the court shall have power to punish of their authority in any cause or hearing before them by fine or imprisonment, at their discretion. The enactment is a limitation upon the manner in which the power shall be exercised, and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment. The judgment of the court debarring the petitioner, treated as a punishment for contempt, was therefore unauthorized and void.

As to the other ground of objection urged—that is, that any interference with the full and complete dominion and discretion of the courts tends to disorganization and to the weakening of judicial authority—judging by the course of previous discussion on this measure, it is not anticipated that the policy of the provision placing a limitation upon the punishment which can be inflicted will be strenuously criticized, and therefore we will make no further comment on that.

TRIAL BY JURY.

The feature of the bill against which the most strenuous argument has been directed is that providing for jury trials. But no one has shown that such provision amounts to anything more than a change of procedure. So that the question comes down to this: Has Congress, or not, the power to prescribe procedure? The courts will still, if this bill passes, have all the substantive power left in their hands by the act of 1831. Not one of the acts there catalogued will have been eliminated. The method of ascertaining the facts in certain cases is changed, but their ascertainment is still under supervision of the court, and ample safeguards are provided against evasions and miscarriages of justice.

A contemnor, from the moment the facts are judicially ascertained, is, by uniform practice, either placed in durance or required to give bail. The result of an adverse judgment is always penal, both in form and effect, though the fine be sometimes turned over to a private litigant.

The manner of disposing of the fine does not alter in any respect the form and effect of the procedure or change it from criminal to civil.

SUCH LEGISLATION LONG DEMANDED.

The bill is an evolution from prolonged and varied discussion, by no means limited to a recent date or to the present Congress. Every feature and provision of it has been subjected to attack and defense, but the whole controversy appears to have at length converged upon the issue of whether or not the policy and practice of jury trial in contempt cases shall be admitted in the Federal jurisprudence at all.

That complaints have been made and irritation has arisen out of the trial of persons charged with contempt in the Federal courts is a matter of general and common knowledge. The charge most commonly made is that the courts, under the equity power, have invaded the criminal domain, and under the guise of trials for contempt have really convicted persons of substantive crimes for which, if indicted, they would have had a constitutional right to be tried by jury. It has been the purpose of your committee in this bill to meet this complaint, believing it to be a sound public policy so to adjust the processes of the courts as to disarm any legitimate criticism; and your committee confidently believes that, so far from weakening the power and effectiveness of Federal courts, this bill will remove a cause of just complaint and promote that popular affection and respect which is in the last resolve the true support of every form of governmental activity.

ACTS OF CONGRESS RELATING TO CONTEMPTS.

Statutes at Large, volume 1, First Congress, first session, chapter 20:

An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That all the said courts of the United States shall have power to grant new trials, in cases where there has been a trial by jury for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law; (a) and shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths or affirmations, and to punish by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of said courts, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same; (b) and to make and establish all necessary rules for the orderly conducting of business in the said courts, provided such rules are not repugnant to the laws of the United States. (This section at p. 83; letters in parentheses refer to notes at the bottom of the page.)

Act of March 2, 1831, upon which sections 725, 5399, 5404, 5405, and 5406, Revised Statutes, above quoted, is based, was as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall, corruptly or by threats or force, endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any juror, witness, or officer, in any court of the United States in the discharge of his duty, or shall, corruptly or by threats or force, obstruct, impede, or endeavor to obstruct or impede the due administration of justice therein, every person or persons so offending shall be liable to prosecution therefor by indictment and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense.

Approved March 2, 1831.

Section 725, Revised Statutes United States (1878):

SEC. 725. The said courts shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority: Provided, That such power to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any case except the misbehavior of any person in their presence or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any such officer or by any party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of said courts. (Stat. L., vol. 4, p. 487, 21st Cong., 2d sess., chap. 99, "An act declaratory of the law concerning contempts of court," approved Mar. 2, 1831.)

NOTE.—Section 725 of the Revised Statutes is reenacted by section 268 of the Judicial Code, effective January 1, 1912, and section 725 is repealed by section 297 of the same code.

Section 268 of the Judicial Code (1912):

SEC. 268. The said courts shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths, and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority: Provided, That such power to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts, in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any such officer, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts. (Rev. Stats., sec. 725, 1878.)

Section 5399, Revised Statutes United States (1878):

SEC. 5399. Every person who corruptly, or by threats or force, endeavors to influence, intimidate, or impede any witness, or officer, in any court of the United States, in the discharge of his duty, or corruptly, or by threats or force, obstructs or impedes, or endeavors to obstruct or impede, the due administration of justice therein, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500, or by imprisonment not more than three months, or both. (Stat. L., vol. 4, p. 488; act approved Mar. 2, 1831.)

Section 5404, Revised Statutes United States (1878):

SEC. 5404. Every person who corruptly, or by threats or force, or by threatening letters, or any threatening communications, endeavors to influence, intimidate, or impede any grand or petit juror of any court of the United States in the discharge of his duty, or who corruptly, or by threats or force, or by threatening letters, or any threatening communications, influences, obstructs, or impedes, or endeavors to influence, obstruct, or impede, the due administration of justice therein, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. (Stat. L., chap. 420, vol. 17, p. 378; act of June 10, 1872.)

Section 5405, Revised Statutes United States (1878):

SEC. 5405. Every person who attempts to influence the action or decision of any grand or petit juror upon any issue or matter pending before such juror or before the jury of which he is a member, or pertaining to his duties, by writing or sending to him any letter or any communication in print or writing in relation to such issue or matter, without the order previously obtained of the court before which the juror is summoned, shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. (Stat. L., vol. 17, p. 378, chap. 420, act of June 10, 1872.)

Section 5406, Revised Statutes United States (1878):

SEC. 5406. If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to deter by force, intimidation, or threat any party or witness in any court of the United States from attending such court or from testifying to any matter pending therein freely, fully, and truthfully, or to injure such party or witness in his person or property on account of his having so attended or testified, or to influence the verdict, presentment, or indictment of any grand or petit juror in any such court, or to injure such juror in his person or property on account of any verdict, presentment, or indictment lawfully assented to by him, or of his being or having been such juror, each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500, nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment with or without hard labor not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment. (Stat. L., vol. 17, p. 13, Apr. 20, 1871.)

NOTE.—Sections 5399, 5404, 5405, and 5406 of the Revised Statutes are repealed by section 341 and reenacted by sections 135, 136, and 137 of the Criminal Code, effective January 1, 1910.

Section 135, Criminal Code (1910):

SEC. 135. Whoever corruptly, or by threats or force, or by any threatening letter or communication, shall endeavor to influence, intimidate, or impede any witness in any court of the United States, or before any United States commissioner or officer acting as such commissioner, or any grand or petit juror or officer in or of any court of the United States, or officer who may be serving at any examination or other proceeding before any United States commissioner or officer acting as such commissioner, in the discharge of his duty, or who corruptly or by threats or force, or by any threatening letter or threatening communication, shall influence, obstruct, or impede, or endeavor to influence, obstruct, or impede the due administration of justice therein, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both. (Rev. Stats., secs. 5399, 5404.)

Section 136, Criminal Code (1910):

SEC. 136. If two or more persons conspire to deter, by force, intimidation, or threat, any party or witness in any court of the United States, or in any examination before a United States commissioner or officer acting as such commissioner, from attending such court or examination, or from testifying to any matter pending therein, freely, fully, and truthfully, or injure such party or witness in his person or property on account of his having so attended or testified, or to influence the verdict, presentment, or indictment of any grand or petit juror in any such court, or to injure such juror in his person or property on account of any verdict, presentment, or indictment lawfully assented to by him, or on account of his being or having been such juror, each of such persons shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than six years, or both. (Rev. Stats., sec. 5406.)

Section 137, Criminal Code (1910):

SEC. 137. Whoever shall attempt to influence the action or decision of any grand or petit juror of any court of the United States, upon any issue or matter pending before such juror, or before the jury of which he is a member, or pertaining to his duties, by writing or sending to him any letter or any communication, in print or writing, in relation to such issue or matter, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both. (Rev. Stats., sec. 5405.)

THE BILL.

[H. R. 22591, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 29, 1912.

Mr. CLAYTON introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

A bill (H. R. 22591) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after section 268 thereof five new sections, to be numbered, respectively, 268a, 268b, 268c, 268d, and 268e, reading as follows:

"SEC. 268a. That any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him, if the act or thing so done by him be of such character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 268b. That whenever it shall be made to appear to any district court or judge thereof, or to any judge therein sitting, by the return of a proper officer on lawful process, or upon the affidavit of some credible person, or by information filed by any district attorney, that there is reasonable ground to believe that any person has been guilty of such contempt, the court or judge thereof, or any judge therein sitting, may issue a rule requiring the said person so charged to show cause upon a day certain why he should not be punished therefor, which rule, together with a copy of the affidavit or information, shall be served upon the person charged with sufficient promptness to enable him to prepare for and make return to the order at the time fixed therein. If upon or by such return, in the judgment of the court, the alleged contempt be not sufficiently purged, a trial shall be directed at a time and place fixed by the court: Provided, however, That if the accused, being a natural person, fail or refuse to make return to the rule to show cause, an attachment may issue against his person to compel an answer, and in case of his continued failure or refusal, or if for any reason it be impracticable to dispose of the matter on the return day, he may be required to give reasonable bail for his attendance at the trial and his submission to the final judgment of the court. Where the accused person is a body corporate, an attachment for the sequestration of its property may be issued upon like refusal or failure to answer.

"In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court, or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury; in which latter event the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance, or the court or the judge thereof in chambers may cause a sufficient number of jurors to be selected and summoned, as provided by law, to attend at the time and place of trial, at which time a jury shall be selected and impaneled as upon a trial for misdemeanor; and such trial shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or upon information.

"If the accused be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them, as the court may direct; but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of $1,000, nor shall such imprisonment exceed the term of six months.

"SEC. 268c. That the evidence taken upon the trial of any person so accused may be preserved by bill of exceptions, and any judgment of conviction may be reviewed upon writ of error in all respects as now provided by law in criminal cases, and may be affirmed, reversed, or modified as justice may require. Upon the granting of such writ of error execution of judgment shall be stayed, and the accused, if thereby sentenced to imprisonment, shall be admitted to bail in such reasonable sum as may be required by the court or by any justice or any judge of any district court of the United States.

"SEC. 268d. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 268a of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

"SEC. 268e. That no proceeding for contempt shall be instituted against any person unless begun within one year from the date of the act complained of; nor shall any such proceeding be a bar to any criminal prosecution for the same act or acts; but nothing herein contained shall affect any proceedings in contempt pending at the time of the passage of this act."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, every argument which has been made in support of this bill can be referred to the report above printed. It is argued that Congress can not require a court of equity to try issues of fact by a jury. It is unquestionably a sound doctrine in the case of Brown against Kalamazoo, but that is wholly inapplicable here. No one thus far has ever insisted that contempt is an equitable cognizance, or other than what the textbooks designate it, namely, a special proceeding, criminal in its nature, not necessarily connected with any particular suit or action pending in court.

Numerous State cases were cited in argument. They may all be answered as a class. The relation between Congress and Federal courts is not the same as that between State legislature and the State courts. The constitutions of the various States themselves provide for and establish the court, partition the powers of government between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, prescribing safeguards, and defining their powers in detail; whereas the Federal Constitution has delegated full and complete control of the matter to Congress. Nor should the fact be overlooked that the State decisions on the subject are often based upon precedents of the common law, which is no part of the Federal system. Thus, in Ex parte McCowan (139 N. Car., 95), that being typical of many such cases relied upon, it was said:

We are satisfied that at common law the acts and conduct of the petitioner as set out in the case, constitute a contempt of court, and if the statute does not embrace this case and in terms repeal the common law applicable to it, we would not hesitate to declare the statute in that respect unconstitutional and void for reasons which we will now state.

In Finck v. O'Neill (106 U. S. Rep., 272) it appeared that Congress has taken from the court all power to enforce its judgment, and the act of Congress was upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case (p. 280) the court said:

The United States can not enforce the collection of a debt from an unwilling debtor, except by judicial process. They must bring a suit and obtain a judgment. To reap the fruit of that judgment they must cause an execution to issue. The courts have no inherent authority to take any one of these steps, except as it may have been conferred by the legislative department; for they can exercise no jurisdiction except as the law confers and limits it.

I ask the membership of this House to read the report made by the committee in full between this time and the time upon which there will be a vote. [Applause.]

I herewith print the letter of Mr. Rogers, which I have before referred to, in which he expresses the opinion that H. R. 21100, which is the pending bill, with verbal inaccuracies corrected, will in no wise conflict with any rights of any person under our patent laws:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 5, 1912.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With reference to House bill 21100. We have not had time to have a full conference of committee or association, but I have gone over this bill carefully with Mr. William W. Dodge, chairman of our committee, and it is our personal opinion that the bill, as worded, does not conflict with patent interests. We take it that the distinction of the Buck Stove v. Gompers case between private litigation and public prosecution has been observed in this bill. In an action at law in a patent cause remedy is by trespass on the case. Either at law or in equity infringement of a patent is a tort. Any failure to obey the decree of a court is brought to the attention of the court by the complainant, and we are unable to see that any such case could "constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or at common law."

When this and other matters are more fully discussed if anything should develop requiring any change in this opinion we will at once advise you.

We are, of course, very much interested in the progress of bills H. R. 11380, 11381, and 15926, and are carefully studying all these propositions.

Very truly, yours, WALTER F. ROGERS.

Mr. Speaker, I now give to the House the letter of Hon. S. S. Gregory, president of the American Bar Association, dated February 2, 1912:

LAW OFFICES OF GREGORY, POPPENHUSEN & MCNAB,
Chicago, February 2, 1912.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been recently addressed, as president of the American Bar Association, by the president of an association of manufacturers to see whether I would not use every possible effort to secure from the Judiciary Committee in the House adverse action upon your bill, House No. 13578, to define and punish contempt of court.

As I am quite in sympathy with the general purpose of this, I have replied that, of course, I could not in any way lend any aid in an effort to defeat it. I did say, however, to that gentleman that I saw no reason why it might not be amended so as to secure a jury trial only in cases where the contempt alleged charged conduct punishable by law as criminal at the time it occurred.

It has seemed to me, however, after having given some attention to this matter, that the great injustice of which the defendants in injunctions, particularly in strike cases, have a right to complain is that when prosecuted, as, for instance, for criminal assault, upon a charge of contempt for violating an injunction against interference with an employer's workingmen, they have really been put upon trial for a breach of the peace, essentially a criminal offense, but without trial by jury. It is quite immaterial what the form of procedure is, as it is not the less a criminal prosecution in which, under the Constitution, the defendant is entitled, at least in Federal courts, to trial by jury.

Therefore this has seemed to me to be an evasion of the Constitution, and I am still of that opinion, although perhaps it may be said that the Supreme Court has countenanced the contrary view. It has occurred to me that if, commencing after the word "behalf," line 14, page 3, of your bill, the language were changed so that the balance of section 4 should read as follows, it would really be an improvement: "Such trial shall be by the court, unless the charge is of conduct punishable by law as criminal at the time it was committed, and unless the accused person shall demand a trial by jury. In case of such demand, where the charge is of such criminal conduct, a trial by jury shall be had, as in a criminal case. If the accused shall be convicted, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, not in excess, however, of the punishment provided by law for such offense."

I think this would be a desirable form to put the bill in, because there is no particular hardship, I think, nor no great complaint of the method of punishing for contempt in ordinary civil causes where the court in a suit between individuals is enforcing obedience to its orders. Possibly, however, there may have been abuses in this field which have escaped my attention. I have no objection whatever to the bill as it stands, except that it occurs to me it might possibly, if adopted, to some extent limit the power of Federal courts where such limitation is not really necessary. If amended as I have suggested, it would certainly meet the point that has been so often urged against what has been called government by injunction, and I really think such a statute would do more to promote industrial peace than any measure that has been recently proposed.

Yours, truly, S. S. GREGORY.

I herewith give to the House the letter of Hon. S. S. Gregory, president of the American Bar Association, dated March 23, 1912, approving the bill H. R. 21100, which is the pending bill, with slight verbal inaccuracies corrected:

LAW OFFICES OF GREGORY, POPPENHUSEN, & MCNAB,
Chicago, March 23, 1912.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: I duly received your favor of the 11th, with copy of House bill 21100 relating to procedure to punish for contempt in the district courts of the United States. The subject is one of great importance.

I have long felt that the practice obtaining in the Federal courts of enjoining against that which was virtually criminal conduct, and then upon alleged breach of such an injunction putting persons on trial virtually for crime without a jury, was in effect an evasion of the Federal Constitution.

It seemed to me that this practice, directed, as it was so largely, against the members of labor organizations, was well calculated to make those organizations feel a deep sense of injustice, to stimulate class feeling, and to suggest to a large part of our population doubts of the impartiality of the national courts. This is very much to be deprecated.

Like you, I believe in our judicial system, and am anxious to do everything possible to uphold it in all its integrity and perfection. I heartily agree that the recall of judges by popular vote is entirely inadmissible in our governmental system; but I would say as to the exercise of the power thus to punish criminal conduct without jury what was said by Sidney Breese, one of the great judges of my own State at an early period in our judicial history, referring to the power to punish for constructive contempts:

"It does not seem to me necessary for the protection of courts in the exercise of their legitimate powers that this one, so liable to abuse, should also be conceded to them. It may be so frequently exercised as to destroy that moral influence which is their best possession, until finally the administration of justice is brought into disrepute. Respect to courts can not be compelled; it is the voluntary tribute of the public to worth, virtue, and intelligence, and whilst they are found upon the judgment seat, so long and no longer will they retain the public confidence.

"If a judge be libeled by the public press he and his assailant should be placed on equal grounds, and their common arbiter should be a jury of the country, and if he has received an injury, ample remuneration will be made. In restricting the power to punish for contempts to the cases specified, more benefits will result than by enlarging it. It is at best an arbitrary power, and should only be exercised on the preservative and not on the vindictive principle." (Stuart v. People, 3 Scam., 395–406.)

I have read your bill carefully, and it seems to me that it is a moderate, just, and expedient measure, and one that ought to be agreed to by all sensible persons.

Of course it may be that should it pass some question might arise in practice which would require to be settled by further legislation. None such now occurs to me, unless there should be a kind of general attempt to enforce the penal code of the United States by suit in equity brought by the Government. This, however, is so remote a contingency that I think it ought to be disregarded.

I may say that while your letter may have been, as you suggest, hurriedly written, I have never seen the general subject treated more intelligently and concisely than it is in your communication.

I sincerely hope that the bill will pass, and if it does, I am satisfied that in its practical operation it will do more to allay the bitterness between capital and labor than any legislation within the power of Congress. It would, I think, also be followed by similar legislation or practice in the several States, and thus have a far-reaching and most salutary effect.

I ought to apologize for not answering your letter more promptly, but ever since its receipt I have been so much crowded with professional engagements, admitting of no delay, that I have been unable to write sooner.

Yours, truly, S. S. GREGORY.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some remarks on the Taylor system of scientific shop management.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print some remarks on the Taylor system of scientific shop management. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print as a House document a speech by the Hon. Woodrow Wilson before the Tariff Commission on the 22d day of September, 1882. It is only three pages long and will involve but very little expense.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to print a tariff speech by Gov. Woodrow Wilson delivered at Atlanta.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman ought to inform the House what the purport of it is.

Mr. HILL. I will. A tariff commission went around the country holding public hearings, in order to frame a tariff bill, and a meeting of that commission was held at Atlanta, Ga. Gov. Wilson appeared before the committee and, in a prepared address, delivered his views on the tariff question.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was in 1882?

Mr. HILL. Yes. I think the country wants to know what the views of Gov. Wilson were and are to-day, as still confirmed by him.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no doubt that Gov. Wilson has sounder views and better economic views generally than the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. And it is for that purpose that I want them printed—to improve my education.

Mr. CLAYTON. And therefore, for the purpose of enlightening the gentleman from Connecticut and his constituents as to sound economical views, I shall not interpose an objection.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to conducting a national political campaign at the expense of the people of the United States by from time to time publishing the utterances, policies, and desires of sundry candidates in the form of House documents, so that Members of Congress may disseminate them free of charge. I think the various parties should pay their own campaign expenses, including the printing bills and the like of that, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17937. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to pay a cash reward for suggestions submitted by employees of certain establishments of the Ordnance Department for improvements or economy in manufacturing processes or plant.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 10, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bill and resolution were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 226) for the appointment of three members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 947), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FERGUSSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6735) to authorize the exchange with the Coconino Cattle Co. of lands within the Coconino National Forest, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 948), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SPEER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2014) for the relief of George Owens, John J. Bradley, William M. Godfrey, Rudolph G. Ebert, Herschel Tupes, William H. Sage, Charles L. Tostevin, Alta B. Spaulding, Grace E. Lewis, and Dolly Neely, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 949), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WICKERSHAM: A bill (H. R. 25662) to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage the development of coal deposits in the Territory of Alaska," approved May 28, 1908, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 25663) conferring upon tribes or bands of Indians the right of nomination of their agent or superintendent, to inspire them to interest themselves in their own affairs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. BARCHFELD: A bill (H. R. 25664) to provide for voluntary admissions to the Government Hospital for the Insane, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. McKELLAR: A bill (H. R. 25678) to provide for 1-cent postage; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WEEKS: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 58) authorizing Herman Walthauser to make a cast of the head of statue of John Hancock now located in Senate wing of the Capitol; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. SULZER: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 335) to authorize a joint assembly of the national legislative bodies of the nations of the world to be held in the United States, and to extend an invitation to said national legislative bodies; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 10, 1912.

(Continuation of legislative day of Saturday, July 6, 1912.)

At 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crane	Kern	Rayner
Borah	Crawford	Lea	Shively
Bradley	Culberson	Lorimer	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Cullom	McCumber	Smoot
Bristow	Curtis	Martin, Va.	Stephenson
Brown	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Sutherland
Bryan	Fletcher	Nelson	Thornton
Burnham	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Tillman
Burton	Gronna	Overman	Warren
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Page	Works
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins
Clapp	Jones	Pomerene

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution and to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will withhold that for a moment. A quorum has not yet been obtained. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names, not a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks that the names of those who have not responded be called. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. WETMORE answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I report back House bill 25069, the sundry civil appropriation bill, so that it may be printed as proposed to be amended by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt very much whether that is in order under the unanimous-consent agreement. An agreement was made, "That on Saturday, July 6, 1912, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, declaring that corrupt practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator from Illinois, and that his election was invalid, and that before adjournment on that legislative day a vote be taken upon said resolution and all amendments to and substitutes therefor."

I understand that unanimous-consent agreements, such as the one above stated, have never been set aside for the introduction of any kind of business.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me right there? I wish to say, first, that this is in the nature of a privileged report; second, that I gave notice before the unanimous-consent agreement was made, gave it in the open Senate, gave it as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that I could not consent to further unanimous-consent agreements that did not provide for or except business regarding appropriation bills, such as a report like the one I now offer, which would take no time, except to pass it across the table to the printer. Unless I can make this report and have it printed, Senators can not have the opportunity of properly examining this large and very important sundry civil appropriation bill without a very considerable delay. So I do not consider that there is any "unanimous-consent" agreement which ought to shut this out, for I had given notice beforehand that I would not consent to such a proposition.

Mr. President, it is not a large matter nor of great importance, only I am liable to have to answer an urgent call to leave the city at any moment, and I desire that the report may be received and printed, so that the appropriation bill may be taken up at an early day. I believe I am entirely within the agreement, first, because I had given notice that such a report should be excepted, and, second, because the agreement itself does not say that other business shall not be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe that always in the past where a unanimous-consent agreement has been reached, it has at least been understood that it would exclude all business in the Senate until that particular business being considered under the unanimous agreement was disposed of. I feel, Mr. President, that this is a matter of enough importance to have a ruling of the Chair upon it, and I shall make the point of order that the report is not in order at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the Chair has read the rule with great care, and while he fails to find any absolute inhibition for the consideration of other business, the Chair is of the opinion that the spirit of the rule, at least, would indicate that the Senate did not intend to do any other business until the matter in hand was disposed of.

Yet the Chair finds that there is a wide difference of opinion on the part of Senators on that point, and the Chair has been appealed to to permit various small matters to be presented to the Senate, such as laying down messages from the House of Representatives. The Chair has not felt at liberty to do so until the matter was at least discussed to some extent. In view of the situation, the Chair feels compelled to submit the matter to the Senate for its judgment.

Mr. WARREN. Will the presiding officer, before doing that, rule upon this point: When a Senator, in the due course of his business and under his duties, gives notice that he can not consent to a unanimous-consent agreement, unless it excepts privileged questions, is that any protection or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would on that point suggest that, unless the exception had been noted in the agreement itself, the Chair would not feel like ruling that that brought the matter within the exception.

Mr. WARREN. Of course that leaves a Senator powerless. He puts the notice in the RECORD and does not happen to be present when the agreement is made. No one knows better than the Chair that those who have to prepare the appropriation bills can not always be in the Chamber, and if such a notice can not avail it would leave a Senator without the protection that it seems to me is due.

Mr. SMOOT. This notice was given June 8, 1912, and if an exception had occurred to the Senator it seems to me it ought to have been brought to the attention of the Senate before the subject matter of the agreement was reached in the Senate for discussion, and then if the Senate wanted to modify the agreement it could have done so.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand what the Senator means by that. This is the first notice I have had that my notice, given before the agreement, had not been observed.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must have known that it was not included in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WARREN. There is nothing that will bar out receiving this report in the proper construction of the unanimous-consent agreement, as the Chair has indicated.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that if any such rule as he now seeks to secure recognition for would be recognized, it would go still further and a Senator could say, "I give notice that I am not going to consent to any unanimous-consent agreement," and then absent himself, and the Senate could be thereafter precluded from the possibility of making a unanimous-consent agreement because one Senator had given notice that he would not consent, and while he was not present to make good that expression he would have the Senate be governed by a notice of that kind.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I shall withdraw the request for permission to report the bill. I have no desire to push the consideration of appropriation bills if the Senate does not so desire; but I certainly wish to acquit myself of being one who is delaying the proper business of the Senate and its early adjournment. I withdraw the request.

Mr. BACON. Senators have not any such special necessity for adjournment that they can not proceed in regular order under the terms of a unanimous-consent agreement, which is one of the most important methods of procedure of the Senate. There should not in any manner be any doubt cast upon the fact that the Senate will not only in letter but in spirit always observe a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I can not let the statement of the Senator from Georgia go unchallenged. A notice which a Senator gives and which is entered in the RECORD is just as much notice to the Senate as though it were printed on the calendar; and if one Senator can object to a request for unanimoust consent—and of course one Senator can—he clearly has the right to announce that he will not consent to unanimous consent as to a given proposition; and if he is unavoidably absent on committee work or otherwise, he certainly would not be bound by action that was taken against his protest entered in the RECORD.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a few words to dissent from the proposition laid down by the Senator from Minnesota. Senators can not leave notice with this body as to what they will do. When unanimous consent is asked, unless objection is made from the floor of the Senate by a Senator who is present, he can not leave his vote here to be recorded against it. The Senate can not do business by proxy in that way. I am startled at the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota that the business of the Senate may be controlled by absent Senators.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that proposition of mine does not propose to control the business of the Senate; it simply prevents the Senate, in the necessary absence of a Senator, from controlling his action and binding him by an agreement to which he is not a party and against which he has entered his protest. The making of unanimous-consent agreements is a very peculiar and a very drastic proposition, and the idea that a Senator, who may be properly absent because of sickness or from any other cause, can be bound here by an agreement to which he is not a party, and against which one single protest would prevent its consummation, I for one can not consent to, and never will.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. When a Senator is absent, whether it be because of sickness or other cause, he can not participate in the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Wyoming has withdrawn the report.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

Mr. CULLOM. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, on which the yeas and nays were ordered on yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, the consideration of this case has doubtless carried it beyond the stage where the conclusion of any Member of this body can be changed by recounting the statements of witnesses. My own conclusions are embodied in the report of the committee, and I shall not attempt to rehearse, in the debate upon this question, what has been carefully and definitively presented in that report.

I was designated as one of the subcommittee originally selected to hear the charges affecting the seat of WILLIAM LORIMER, and upon the reopening of the case upon the suggestion of new evidence it again became my duty to sit with the committee charged with the hearing of the evidence. These two assignments, together with the time required to consider the evidence and report our conclusions to the Senate, have occupied much of my time for over 160 days, and I can not but feel that I have not discharged the full burden of the duty involved without adding to the formal report of the committee a brief reference to my personal conclusions and my personal impressions of the atmosphere created by the hearings, in addition to the paralyzing conclusiveness of the bare facts.

Mr. President, I shall assume that every Senator who intends to vote to unseat WILLIAM LORIMER is familiar with the printed evidence and has carefully considered the report of the committee selected by the Senate to ascertain the facts. Corruption is often less infamous and uniformly less cruel than injustice, and a judgment of ouster against the Senator from Illinois rendered without a patient and full consideration of the evidence would be opposed to a fundamental maxim of humanity and of Anglo-Saxon liberty—the presumption of innocence.

This proceeding, Mr. President, is a criminal trial in which it is conceded that there is no evidence tending to show complicity on the part of the defendant with the crime charged, and in which those charged with the actual corruption, and whose guilt is necessary to a judgment of ouster, have been discharged after trial by their peers. Even those Senators upon the committee reporting in favor of unseating Senator LORIMER failed to oppose the finding of the majority "that there was nothing in the testimony to show that LORIMER himself had engaged in corrupt practices or that he personally knew of any such corrupt means being employed by others."

Nine thousand pages of evidence failed to discover any basis for the charges against his personal character. On the contrary, the evidence demonstrates a common injustice of the day. The Chicago press assailed LORIMER with such venom that the country was led to believe him a monster unfit to live, much less to sit in the Senate. A rare record of the degree of his personal unpopularity was shown when Col. Theodore Roosevelt, the Rough Rider of gusty politics, yielding to the storm, declined to sit as a guest at the board of a Republican club if LORIMER, a member of the club and a Senator in Congress, holding his commission from the sovereign people, was to attend. It is unimportant that the premise on which Col. Roosevelt acted—the hearsay evidence of Funk—has been exploded by the testimony, for there is no question of following that prophet of political expediency when Senators are under their oaths.

The essential thing is that LORIMER, the defendant in this case, is conceded by his bitterest opponents to be a man whose personal reputation repudiates, prima facie, any possibility of complicity in the corrupt purchase of a seat in this body. His implacable enemy, the editor of the Chicago Tribune, swore that "LORIMER was more dangerous because of his irreproachable qualities of a personal sort." Mr. Kohlsaat, of the Record-Herald, who, it seems, whispers rumors to judges upon the bench, an inveterate foe, testifies: "His home life, his family life is ideal." The present governor of Illinois testifies to his favorable impression of LORIMER's character; the Republican nominee whom he defeated for the Senate and his Democratic opponent join in statements as to LORIMER which would gratify any man in this Senate. So universal was this testimony as to his integrity, his frankness, his fidelity to his word, that the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who opened this debate against him, was led to say:

> My duty here is particularly painful because the man whose right to a seat here is a fellow Senator, a man of pleasing personality, whose private life, as I understand it, has been pure and whose home life is ideal.

These conclusions from the evidence, Mr. President, do not present the weightiest reason for resolving any doubt arising from it in favor of Senator LORIMER. The undisputed narrative of his life, his earliest struggles, and his success, culminating in a seat in this body, furnish a page that will compare favorably with the best American traditions if it is not to be tarnished by a judgment of conviction on this hearing.

Eliminating sentiment and reviewing his homely efforts with that consideration of the facts which bases its conclusion as to character upon experience, we find that the vital facts of LORIMER's life point against a sudden surrender of integrity to ambition. The eldest of six children, he assumed at the age of 10, on the death of his father, a Presbyterian minister, the courageous support of his mother and the education of his brother and sisters. As newsboy, cash boy, common laborer, house painter, and street-car conductor, he maintained the respectability of his family and the dignity of labor. His brave struggle to overcome his lack of education testifies to the universal gentility of intellect. Time was when the patient fulfillment of these duties counted for more than a grudging prima facie certificate of character. It is certain that the people amongst whom he lived found no just ground for discrediting his motives or his integrity, for they elected him six times to represent his district in Congress.

This, Mr. President, is the defendant we are to try. Can any member of this body, in the light of these undisputed facts, approach a consideration of the evidence bearing on the charges without a determination that the presumption of regularity must be affirmatively overcome before the established character of Senator LORIMER is repudiated and blackened by expulsion as the beneficiary of fraud?

It is, moreover, worthy of your consideration that WILLIAM LORIMER, though conceded to be innocent of complicity in any wrongdoing, is now sought to be damned for all time, whereas the agents of the alleged fraud have been exonerated by juries representing the very people whose honor is at stake; and those miserable beings who have confessed to perjury and legislative bribery have been given immunity. The people of Illinois acquit those charged with voting corruptly, the prosecuting attorneys of Illinois release those who confessed to perjury and bribery, and the Senate is now asked to square the jail delivery by crucifying the man who is shown by the overwhelming evidence to have had no knowledge or part in any wrongdoing.

In order to reach this result, Mr. President, the evidence must show that others employed corrupt means without his knowledge or consent, to an extent that resulted in his election by corrupt votes.

On the final vote, when Senator LORIMER was elected, he received 108 votes; Hopkins, 70; and Stringer, 24. The total vote against his election was 94; and it was necessary to show, in order to unseat him, that at least 14 men were corruptly influenced to vote for LORIMER which would have reduced his honest and unassailed vote to 94, the total number received by Hopkins and Stringer. Strange to say, this is exactly the number of votes the minority report alleges to have been thus corrupted.

The chief witness to this fact is White, a man so corrupt, according to his own testimony, as to challenge the thought as to whether he could swear the truth if he tried, and to carry the conviction that he never tried. No voice has been heard, nor even a suggestion from a partisan press, in defense of the character of this debauchee. He is impeached by numerous witnesses for the prosecution, and admitted under oath that his own statements were false in material points, and were plain Anglo-Saxon lies.

The evidence given by Holstlaw, Beckemeyer, and Link is relied on to show that, after the election, money was paid them, and yet each one of them repeatedly swore that he voted for LORIMER without any reward or the hope thereof. But one man, appropriately named White, because his character is so black, is the only man who the record shows to have claimed to do this.

The State was scoured by newspaper men and by detectives paid to secure evidence. Every member of the legislature who exhibited money about that time, and practically every member who voted for LORIMER, including the speaker of the house, was put under suspicion and forced to explain. Out of the mass of testimony thus produced the minority have found, in the face of formidable and creditable testimony at every point, only 14 men, the magic and essential number, out of 108, whom they suggest were corrupted. I say the magic number, because, under the well-established principles controlling the decision of this matter, the corrupt and illegal vote, where the member himself does not know of or engage in the wrong, must be first excluded, and if it appears that a majority of honest legal votes remain he is still entitled to his seat.

Another singular argument appears in this case. LORIMER received on the final ballot the votes of 55 Republicans and 53 Democrats—108. Not a single Republican vote is challenged by the minority. I want the Democrats here to observe that fact—not a single Republican vote is challenged by the minority. Each one of the 14 alleged corrupt voters is a Democrat. Yet wholesale corruption is alleged to have prevailed—a corruption confined to Democrats, a sort of Democratic leprosy, which demonstrates in a startling manner the hitherto unsuspected sanctity and honesty of the Republicans of Illinois. It is inconceivable that if this carnival of corruption existed an agent going the rounds to buy votes would not find one Republican out of 127 in the legislature that would sell his vote.

I am reluctantly constrained to the opinion that certain Senators upon this side of the Chamber, my Democratic colleagues, are disposed to base their conclusions upon this matter upon a general conviction, in contradiction of the theory to which I have just referred, that the Republican Party in Illinois is a reproach upon public morals and that in some way WILLIAM LORIMER, as a prominent Republican in the State, is tarred with the reproach of the general system and should be rebuked. No member of the Senate has more painful personal recollection of the abuses of the Republican Party than I. In its age of youth, if not of its purity, it sent its renegades and scalawags to rule my people, and to further this purpose manufactured a vast black and illiterate electorate in a night. The evil that they did has survived only to the own undoing of their creators. Their national convention trembles at the racial instability of the negro delegate and proud leaders cringe before him. The Senator from Indiana, intent in his loyalty to Democratic traditions and justly suspicious of the good faith of a political organization which persistently breaks faith with the people and ignores its just obligations, has not the reason for crying out against that organization that I have; but that prejudice, Mr. President, confirmed by the general idea that municipal politics of the present day is a menace to political freedom, should not count for a jot or a tittle in considering the question of the regularity and legality of the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

Some Senators of the minority of the committee in this case seem to have conceived the idea that every Democrat who voted for LORIMER did so corruptly, although the evidence distinctly shows that there were 127 Republicans in the legislature and only 77 Democrats. This conclusion is doubtless based upon the idea that I have suggested—that no honest Democrat could vote for any Republican of Illinois. But it is certain the Democrats were hopeless of electing one of their own party after the vain effort to elect had continued for months. As a matter of fact, the fact that these Democrats, or a majority of them, voted for LORIMER to defeat the nominee of a Republican primary is less a matter of surprise than the vote cast by the Republicans contrary to the recommendation of that primary. Every Democrat on this floor knows that, as between LORIMER and Hopkins, the majority of Democrats, hopeless of success in their own ranks, would have voted for LORIMER. If it be prima facie evidence of corruption when a Democrat under any circumstances votes for a Republican, it would cast suspicion upon every Democrat who, under like circumstances, has obtained Republican votes. A Democratic Senator in this body from the State of Tennessee, whose seat is uncontested, was elected by the votes of 32 Republicans and 34 Democrats, and he had a majority of 2, I believe, to elect him; and my good friend the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] would be tarred with this suspicion, as he received every Democratic vote in the legislature.

The charges of corruption in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER were examined, exhaustively argued, and acted upon by the Senate in the Sixty-first Congress. The contention that a Member's right to a seat in this body can be tried, judicially determined, and subsequently reopened on the same facts for consideration at a subsequent session of the Senate, when it is hoped that a change in the membership will result differently, is, upon the bare statement of the proposition, a shock to the conscience. The uniform precedents established by the practice of the Senate in such matters sustain the dignity and conclusiveness of its former judgment. It is to the interest of the public business that successive sessions should not be monopolized by the consideration of contests most frequently involving partisan questions. The pending matter demonstrates the wisdom of the rule. It is conceivable that where public indignation has been aroused concerning a Member of this body, whose right to a seat is contested, candidates for the Senate in the various States, who base their appeal upon issues which they fancy will stir the popular pulse rather than upon their character, their intellectual independence, and their record of patient service, might try the contests on the hustings and come into this body committed to reopen and condemn, without having had the opportunity, or of having been under the sworn duty, of reaching a conclusion upon the facts. Retrial under such circumstances would be a disgrace to justice. Mr. President, it would humiliate me, as a Member of this body, if I were forced to the conclusion that the instance that I have just supposed is not altogether remote.

In the case of Fitch and Bright, Senators from Indiana, who were seated by the Senate on hearing the contest, in May, 1858, the case was subsequently reopened by the Senate in 1859, upon the request of the Legislature of Indiana. After consideration, it was solemnly decided by the Senate that the decision made in 1858 established finally and irrevocably their right to seats and that the judgment was final.

The same conclusion was reached by the Senate in the case of Sykes against Spencer, from Alabama; the committee reported in that case that—

> The question on the former trial was whether the courthouse legislature was the lawful legislature; and that having been definitely settled, it was considered by the committee that it was not competent for the committee or the Senate to reopen it, and that it must be treated as res adjudicata—and no minority report was presented by the committee, though such illustrious Democrats as Saulsbury of Delaware, Merrimon of North Carolina, and Cooper of Tennessee were members of the committee; so also was this followed in the case of Corbin against Butler, from the State of South Carolina.

In the case of Senator DU PONT of Delaware, the Republican majority of the committee reported that he was entitled to his seat in November, 1895. Senators Turpie of Indiana, Pugh of Alabama, Gray of Delaware, and Palmer of Illinois, Democrats, dissented, and their minority report was adopted as the judgment of the Senate by a majority of 1, and DU PONT was denied his seat. The case was reopened by the Senate, and upon consideration the committee reported without a single dissenting voice that the Senate having decided the case, it was final and conclusive. Senator Hoar was chairman of the committee, and Senator Edmunds and all the Democratic and Republican members joined in this report, save one, who withheld his judgment. Senator Hoar said on the floor that "he believed DU PONT had been lawfully elected and he desired him to be seated; but that no newly discovered evidence was found or mistake suggested, and that the case having been decided, nothing remained but to declare it final."

The basest assassin and most hardened criminal can not, after acquittal, be tried again for the same offense in any Anglo-Saxon country in the world. If the right of a Senator to a seat in the Senate can be tried over and over again, it is at the whim of a changing majority. His right is not merely his right to a seat, which may be of small consequence, but it involves his reputation, his honor, and the future peace and happiness of his wife and children, and, more than all, as I have said, the right of a sovereign State to have its chosen representative in this body, however ill fitted he may be to serve.

The Senator from Indiana attempts to defeat the plea of res adjudicata by the argument that it should have been made at the outset against a reopening of the case.

When that matter was before the Senate, the chairman of the committee, Mr. DILLINGHAM, said very wisely:

> We do not doubt that the Senate, like other courts, may review its own judgments where new evidence has been discovered, or where by reason of fraud or accident it appears that the judgment ought to be reviewed. The remedy which in other courts may be given by writs of review or errors or bills of review may doubtless be given here by a simple vote reversing the first adjudication. We have no doubt that a legal doctrine involved in a former judgment of the Senate may be overruled in later cases. But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their minds as to the law or facts which are involved.

We were agreed that if newly discovered evidence had been found showing that $100,000, or any other sum, had been raised and used to secure the election of Senator LORIMER by Mr. Hines or any other person, he should be unseated, but we could not tell in advance of the investigation whether such were the facts. We were willing to reopen the case for the purpose of giving the widest latitude to prove this alleged fact, but the majority after hearing all the evidence has found that such was not the fact and, accordingly, that the Senate should not recede from its former judgment.

The testimony of Funk is relied on. I shall not burden the Senate with a review of the facts, which, in my opinion, refute Funk's statement beyond defense. Even had it been established beyond dispute that Hines had told him that they had used $100,000 to elect LORIMER, that would not prove the fact that one cent was used in electing LORIMER. The evidence is overwhelming that Hines did not raise or expend any money in connection with securing votes for LORIMER.

For these reasons and upon the evidence it is my solemn conclusion that no new evidence has been adduced showing that the judgment of the Senate rendered at the Sixty-first Congress should be reviewed, and that, upon the whole evidence, the charges of corruption have not been sustained.

I am not induced to this conclusion by any friendship or sympathy for WILLIAM LORIMER. Had it been established to my reasonable satisfaction that a single vote had been corruptly influenced in his favor and to his knowledge or that his majority was due to fraudulent votes, I should unhesitatingly vote to unseat him. Senator LORIMER'S political convictions are not mine. My first political battles were spent in the effort to free my State from the baleful influence of his party, and I should be glad to do my part in directing the Nation's attention to so signal a crime as the purchase of a seat in this body by a Republican of long service if the evidence justified it. In my opinion, the evidence fails.

Mr. President, I have heard it whispered around this Chamber that my conclusion is opposed to the conclusion of the majority of the Senate; that the recent campaign for the Republican nomination, in which the leading candidates, neither of whom was or is charged with the sworn duty of reaching a conclusion upon the evidence, vied with each other in decrying LORIMER, and thereby revived the unpopularity of WILLIAM LORIMER; that this has lost his cause, and I have been advised to "drop LORIMER" and save myself.

Mr. President, I entered the Confederate Army in April, 1861, because the State of Alabama had seceded from the Union, and I believed their cause was righteous, and that it was my duty so to do. For four long, bloody years I followed the flag of Dixie; sometimes in defeat and often to victory. I became convinced before the surrender that we could not succeed, because we could not replace the brave men who fell on the field of battle. We were shut out from the world and could only draw recruits from the cradle. The idea never came into my mind that, because we must inevitably fail, I should desert to the enemy. I stood by my colors facing death and defeat until Lee and Johnston surrendered the fragments of glorious armies whose fame will never die. The span of my years may be shortened by the shot stopped by my breast in that failing cause, but, all in all, my keenest satisfaction in the past rests not upon those moments when I swam with the tide, but when I bared my breast, with Ajax, and took the lightning. Mr. President, I refuse to save myself at the sacrifice of my convictions and my honor.
